"I'm proud of the work. I put my heart and soul into it," she says. "This is a beautiful business. It's a party all the time."

Hullaballoon at 399 Old Orchard Grove near Avenue Road offers a variety of party supplies, including custom centre-pieces and hall decor for simchahs — bar/bat mitzvahs, weddings and sweet sixteens — as well as bouquets for a variety of occasions.

Steeves has been working in the party business for seven years. Balloon centre-pieces are an alternative to flowers, he says.

For example, "we do a baseball theme centre-piece with a cap and a hollow bat. The balloons come out of the bat."

All the balloons he uses are biodegradable, he says. "They disintegrate faster than oak leaves." He also treats all the balloons he inflates so they'll last longer, he says.

Balloons offer a variety of color. Jewel tones like ruby red and quartz purple add striking color to the room, while metallic and pastel balloons add elegance to affairs like weddings, he says.

Hullaballoon also rents out helium tanks. For about $75, you can fill between 200 and 225 balloons.

Hullaballoon can also arrange for a clown for birthday parties and corporate events, sign-in boards, props, novelties and give-aways. The company's balloon decor includes monograms, Stars of David, arches, rainbows and sculptures, Steeves says.

Mandell gives back to the community

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

DJ Corey Mandell, 26, has achieved remarkable success in a relatively short time.

He has seen the Mandell Entertainment Group, his Richmond Hill-based company, grow from two to 65 DJs in less than five years and this year he established a satellite office in Vancouver.

The entertainment company, a one-stop party conglomerate, books DJs, dancers, lighting technicians and offers party decorating and planning services.

But Mandell's accomplishments goes beyond his business savvy. His success can also be measured by his generosity. He gives a lot of time and money to the community.

He recently sponsored the Mandell Entertainment Group Classic, a golf tournament fundraiser for Associated Hebrew Schools, presented by the Parents Association. He'll be underwriting this event for the next two years because he strongly believes that making a contribution to the community is a necessity, he says.

"The Jewish community has supported my company. I try to find opportunities to return something to the community."

Following the recent community March for Israel, which culminated with the Jerusalem 3000 festival held at North York Centennial Arena, Mandell emceed the main stage program.

He's been performing at the Baycrest Fun Run for the last five years and he appeared at the Adam Kruger Bone Marrow Benefit, held last week at Shark City Bar and Grill.

Other community events Mandell Entertainment supports include the Rena (Foundation) Fun Day and the Israeli Cancer Research Society masquerade ball.

Thornhill residents with children or grandchildren in the Thornhill Soft Ball League may have noticed some of the kids wearing the Mandell Entertainment Group Party Animals team shirts. The company sponsors three teams in three separate divisions and distributes 800 sports bags for all the players in the league.

Every summer Mandell Entertainment tours the summer camps north of Toronto providing free entertainment for the campers. "The kids love it. It's unbelievable," Mandell says.

The summer camp tour, now in its fifth year, is sponsored by Roots. "Michael Budman and Don Green (the owners of Roots) loved the idea from the start when I presented it to them in 1991, Mandell" says.

Babbling Rice

Summer job turns into full-time biz

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Selling novelty necklaces was supposed to be a summer business for two York University students. They set out to become street vendors last year.

But they were so successful marketing their product that they had to put their education on hold to run their company Babbling Rice which now employs as many as 35 people full and part time.

Film student Jody Bresgi, 22, and business major Natalie Mamman, 21, both Associated Hebrew Schools alumnae, teamed up with Amir Goldstein, to sell these handcrafted necklaces.

Each has a personalized message hand-painted on a single grain of rice. The rice is then placed in a special liquid preservative which is encapsulated in a glass tube and hung on a black waxed cord. The necklaces cost between $10 to $15.

The three friends had heard that these necklaces were being sold by street vendors in Israel and South Africa and decided to bring the product to Canada.

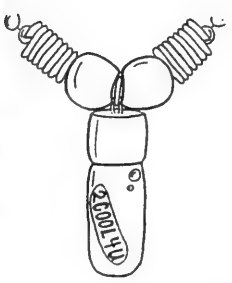
They didn't have a prototype so they had to experiment with different types of rice and inks to find the right combination, Bresgi said. "It took months of research to find the perfect product."

Initially, company headquarters were in Bresgi's bedroom and as sales grew the company expanded into her parents' basement. Today the company is housed in an office at Eglinton and Yonge.

Jody Bresgi

Bresgi, Mamman and Goldstein first hit the schools approaching graduating students looking for mementos. They expanded to the party and promotional business and have sold approximately 45,000 units since they set up shop. The personalized necklaces are very popular novelty gifts for bar and bat mitzvahs, Bresgi said.

Babbling Rice has added different shaped pendants — heart and dolphin — and it will soon be offering key chains and bracelets. The company is also planning to increase its market base by selling to larger chain stores, Bresgi said.



She and her partners plan to expand their line with new products. At this time Goldstein is in Israel exploring new ideas for development, she said.

Bresgi views the business as a way to develop practical skills for the future, she says. "It's not just a moneymaker. We are investing in our future. We're learning as we go along."

Trade show connects you to party professionals

'We're having a party!'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Planning a party and don't know where to begin? Rick Levine (905-881-6400) and Lynn Cohen (905-889-1007), organizers of We're Having a Party, know just the place to turn.

"We're Having a Party is a trade show with a party atmosphere," says Levine. "The party planning public can taste the food, dance to the music and see the bridal gowns and formal wear on live models. A visit to our event is intended to be an experience, in many ways, much like being at an actual party."

Cohen, a party consultant for more than 20 years, knows that "choosing the right entertainment, photographer, videographer, invitation, makeup artist, to name a few, makes the difference. We're Having a Party is a way of connecting you, the party planner, with qualified professionals who will contribute to your most memorable occasion. The information is brought to your fingertips with the intention that your planning needs will be simplified."

The show was conceived, says Levine, when a group of party planning professionals got together to plan a novel way to promote their talents and expertise.

"Our goal was to bring awareness to the community, of the fine group of professionals that provide services as well as giving people in the show a chance to advertise. Since its inception, the show has grown beyond what we can accommodate in one room so we have expanded in order to give every exhibitor a chance to put their best foot forward," he says.

Levine, an orchestra leader who offers a full entertainment package including disc jockeys, MCs and dancers, says that We're Having a Party is particularly helpful for people who are making a party but do not know where to begin or for those who have made some contacts but have not yet met the professionals.

"This way, they can see them under one roof. Its a great way to introduce themselves to the party planning atmosphere," he says.

Rick Levine & Lynn Cohen, organizers of We're Having A Party. [Hudson Taylor photo]

"We've had four shows and we've always had tremendous feedback from everyone. Exhibitors felt the contact they made with the public was worthwhile and guests were pleased to be able to do all their shopping under one roof. They can make their decisions in one place and not wear themselves out running around," he says.

Levine and Cohen, who are already planning next year's event, coordinated a guide and directory, published by Custom Graphics, that is available to all We're Having a Party guests.

The comprehensive catalogue, perfect for anyone planning an event, is available to the public and offers such advice as how to preserve a wedding gown, choose a band or hire a videographer. As well, it is crammed with information about the chupah and wedding ceremony, gems, makeup and interior design.

Victoria lawyer dissociates himself from Christie, Nazism

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Ten years after he received the George Orwell Free Speech Award from Victoria lawyer Doug Christie's Canadian Free Speech League (on April 20, Hitler's birthday), Gary Botting, another Victoria lawyer, returned it to Christie alleging the League is a front for "anti-Semitic pro-Nazi propaganda."

Botting wanted to return the plaque to Christie in person, but Christie's office in the centre of a downtown parking lot was closed. So Botting dropped it through the mail slot.

It was the second time within a couple of weeks that Botting, who had been a defence witness at one of the Ernst Zundel trials, tried to dissociate himself from the taint of Nazism.

His first attempt was to denounce Zundel for peddling on the Internet an interview Botting had done with Zundel. Botting said he had participated willingly in the interview, because the theme was "culture myth" and censorship.

In his second effort, Botting charged that the Canadian Free Speech League was authoritarian "and not in the least open to free speech ... I sincerely doubt that you know what free speech really is," he told Christie in a letter.

Copies of two of Botting's letters to Christie, both dated April 19, were made available to The CJN by the newly organized Victoria lodge of B'nai B'rith.

Botting wrote that free speech is a "marketplace where a variety of opinions are aired without fear of censure." The connection of the League with Nazism is "a travesty of free speech," he continued.

"To link the name of George Orwell with a pro-Nazi agenda is a travesty, for Orwell was as outspoken against Nazism and anti-Semitism as any public voice during World War II."

Botting said he testified at the Zundel trial at Christie's urging because at the time "Ernst Zundel was presented as a publisher who was being censured and censored.

"As an author and professor [at a Red Deer community college] and publisher, and as a founding president of the Alberta Publishers Association, I was very concerned about censorship of this kind."

He said he was formerly a Jehovah's Witness and was concerned about the section of the Criminal Code under which Zundel had been charged — spreading false news — "since news by definition is current." The same law, he said, had been used as a line of attack in Jehovah Witness sedition cases.

Botting said if Zundel persists in promoting the interview "under the rubric and logo of Samisdat (Zundel's publishing firm), he will take action against him on the Internet and elsewhere in the federal court of Canada.

Botting articled under Christie in Victoria when he became a lawyer after leaving teaching.

Winnipeg police investigate hate letter against blacks, Jews

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — This city's police Hate Crimes Unit is investigating a letter, copies of which were mailed to several black members of the community, wishing they were dead.

According to Sgt. Ron Oliver of the unit, the letter contains a photo of the downed ValuJet that crashed in the Florida Everglades recently along with a "replacement list" of Winnipeggers and other people that the writer wishes had been on the doomed flight.

"Most of the names on the list were black people, many from the sports world, and a few names of local Jewish people whom the writer referred to as whitish," Oliver says.

"The writer was not threatening the people on the list directly. Rather, he was saying that this would have been his manifest if he had had his way. We have contacted everyone locally who was on the list."

Michael Lazar, chair of the Midwest region of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, sees this as another example of the "growing intolerance invading our communities." He finds it disturbing that the letter, which he hasn't seen yet, seems to list only members of ethnic and racial communities.

Holocaust Education symposium held in Victoria

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Tears flowed freely as the tragic story of Anne Frank was repeated for 1,200 grades 7 to 12 students from the Greater Victoria area and other points on Vancouver Island who attended the fourth annual Holocaust Education Symposium at the University of Victoria (UVic).

A multi-media presentation, Through the Eyes of a Friend, by Seattle actor Rachel McClinton, related the Anne Frank story. McClinton acted the part of Anne's friend, using videotape of photos of the two girls as young children growing up. Newsreel footage from the war period played behind McClinton and another taped voice played the part of Anne.

Dr. Peter Gary, a Bergen-Belsen survivor, who launched the educational days four years ago, said the reaction of the students was one of the most moving he has witnessed during his years of effort to rekindle memories of the Holocaust. He noted that for the first time, students were asked to pay $5 each to attend the memorial but it was no deterrent to attracting an overflow audience.

Gary said the symposium, sponsored by the Victoria Holocaust Remembrance and Education Society, was designed to acquaint another generation with Holocaust atrocities and to warn of current hate movements.

Students were asked by David Katz, who was in charge of arrangements for the 1996 symposium, "to address racism wherever, whenever they exist, with the spirit of positive action."

Rabbi Victor Reinstein, of Congregation Emanu-El, warned about the sin of keeping silent about acts of racism, and said that "whenever we meet someone who is 'different' we are being tested. The moments we encounter differences are tests for all of us because ultimately the Holocaust starts when good people stand by and do nothing."

Dr. Bill Woodward, a Victoria physician, was in tears when he described what he found in Bergen-Belsen when the camp was liberated by the British. He said he can never erase the scene from his mind, even after 50 years.

A number of survivors living in Victoria and Vancouver told of their experiences in the camps. Bill Gluck, who was at Auschwitz, said young people must know about the Nazi atrocities. Born in Hungary, Gluck said anti-Jewish hate, propaganda and bloodletting was part of daily life. "We didn't know any better; we thought it was normal. Who is to say it can't happen again? When I hear the term ethnic cleansing, I still get goose pimples — and it's back!"

Kaye to lead Saskatchewan kallah

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

SASKATOON — Zac Kaye, director of Toronto's Jewish Campus Services, and his wife, Suzanne, will be the facilitators at the fourth annual kallah for Saskatchewan's Jewish communities.

The kallah is taking place June 7 to 9 at the newly opened Temple Gardens Spa in Moose Jaw, just west of Regina. The theme will be Shabbat — An Island In Time. Sessions will deal with the study of particular texts and with Jewish identity.

"We try to make this experiential," says kallah co-chair June Avivi of Saskatoon. "On Sunday morning, for example, we will have a session we call Doing Jewish. The purpose is to help people develop a 'tool kit' of Jewish rituals they can do in their own home."

Avivi reports that about 50 adults are expected to attend. She notes that although census numbers show the Saskatchewan Jewish community to number about 2,000, community leaders believe the real number is somewhat smaller.

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada is looking for 20 to 30 volunteer photographers to participate in a project whose goal is to photograph and document every one of the 16,000 Jewish memorial stones in Winnipeg and rural Manitoba.

The project began in the spring of 1995, when genealogist Bev Rayburn approached Louis Kessler, program chair of the Jewish Historical Society's Genealogical Institute, to suggest that every stone in Jewish cemeteries in Manitoba be transcribed. This type of project, she said, was being undertaken by genealogical societies in many parts of the world.

"The information on the stones is of great value to genealogists," says Kessler. "Jewish gravestones also give the name of the person's father, which gives clues to earlier generations."

Rayburn agreed to lead the project. The team's first idea was to follow the example of the genealogical societies and transcribe the information on the stones — a very time consuming project, made even tougher due to the difficulty of entering Hebrew into a computer.

"We thought that maybe we could take photos instead," says Kessler. "It would take a lot less time and the results would be far more accurate."

In addition to allowing the reconstruction of damaged stones, the advantages of photography include making the information readily available to genealogists and researchers worldwide and preserving tombstones and historical objects. The difficulty was the cost of film, processing and albums.

Rayburn and Kessler contacted the synagogues which operate Winnipeg's four Jewish cemeteries, and found them receptive to the plan.

Last fall, they approached Harry Gutkin, president of the Jewish Historical Society, who offered his and the society's support. They signed on Lee Saidman, the former owner of Sam The Camera Man, to coordinate the photo shoot, and genealogist Lynn Roseman to coordinate the overall project. They also applied to the Manitoba Heritage Grants Foundation and the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba for $5,300 each to cover expenses.

Saidman estimates that about 150 hours of photography are required. He would prefer people with some photography experience, but he is prepared to train volunteers.

The project team envisages volunteers working in pairs, with one person taking the pictures and the other keeping track of the photos taken. They hope to have all the photography done over the summer and then spend the fall and winter cataloguing the information.

Winnipegger leaves $1.1 million to kidney research

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

Block's bequest is the largest single gift the foundation has ever received and is more than double the total endowments received over the last 20 years.

Block died in 1991 at the age of 75. For the last few years, he had been suffering an illness that required dialysis.

The Kidney Foundation is directing interest earned from the bequest initially into research to find ways of preventing transplant rejection without the use of massive doses of medication.

Haifa mayor cancels trip

Mitzna was to have attended several functions this week, including the signing of a friendship agreement between Haifa and North York.

He was invited by the Canadian Committee for the Haifa Foundation.

Mitzna backed out because of concern over the close election in Israel, committee coordinator David Marks said.

Earlier this spring, Tel Aviv Mayor Roni Milo cancelled visits to Montreal and Toronto.

Rosalyn Yalow...

By LINDA ANDER
Special to The CJN

Rosalyn Yalow is a scientist who is also a bubbie. She says her idea of fun is to take a problem and analyse it. She has won the highest award for science, the Nobel Prize.

Rosalyn was born on July 19, 1921 in a Jewish section of New York. She was a spunky child. On the first day of school a teacher hit her on the knuckles. Feeling the injustice of this, she grabbed the ruler and hit back.

In addition to being courageous, she was very bright and got excellent marks, especially in math. In public school she told all her friends she was going to be a scientist, get married and have a family.

After high school she went to an all- women's university, where she majored in physics and chemistry. But one university turned her down afterwards for a PhD program. "She's a Jew and a woman, and we can never get her a job," the university staff wrote.

The University of Illinois accepted her as a graduate student — the only woman among 400 men. On the first day of classes she met her future husband Aaron Yalow. Despite her excellent marks, she still faced the prejudice of professors who did not feel women could do science.

Rosalyn had become a scientist when the next part of her dream came true. She married Aaron and their son Benjamin was born in 1952 and their daughter Elanna in 1954.

Rosalyn and Aaron both had busy lives, but they kept a kosher home and observed Shabbat.

Elanna remembers her mother arriving home every day at 5:45 p.m., but by 7:30 p.m. she'd almost always go back to work. Her children went to the lab with her on Sunday afternoons, where they played with the research animals.

Rosalyn worked for nine years with her research partner Sol Berson. They discovered that by using a radioactive element they could measure exact amounts of substances in blood. Using Radio immunoassay (RIA for short) they could check a small amount of blood in a test tube to measure the amount of insulin. This was important because diabetics could be monitored and treated with more accuracy.

When they awarded her the Nobel Prize, the committee said: "Measuring the amount of insulin in a test tube is the same as showing that there is a teaspoon of sugar in a lake 62 miles long and 62 miles wide and 30 feet deep."

SIMON KIRSHENBLAT

By the 1960s, RIAs were used in blood-banks to check for hepatitis which can harm your liver. Using RIAs, babies could be checked for thyroid problems that if left untreated could cause brain damage. RIA is even used to solve crimes by detecting a small amount of a drug in a body.

When Sol died in 1972, Rosalyn lost both a partner and a friend.

In 1977, Rosalyn won the Nobel Prize and became a celebrity. She went to Norway to accept her prize and was escorted into a grand ballroom by the king. She received a gold medal and a cheque for $72,500. Millions heard her speak about the need for the next generation to do more than the last.

Her message to students is: "You won't all win Nobel Prizes but the important thing is that you set goals for yourself."

Vaughan parents fight pesticides

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

THORNHILL — A group of concerned parents in Vaughan are not content to just talk about the dangers of pesticide use.

They are not even content to restrict it on their own properties.

They have therefore formed the Pesticide Action Committee and presented a petition to Vaughan Council last month, asking the Parks Department to phase out the use of pesticides for cosmetic purposes and in the meantime, to use them only after exploring and exhausting all non-chemical options, to review the pesticides currently being used, to give proper notification when pesticides are used (a hotline was suggested) and to begin a public education campaign which would be endorsed by the city and organized by the Parks Department and the committee.

Terri Mittelmann, media contact for the group, said the Parks Department is expected to respond to their petition in the middle of June.

Dr. David Starr, who made the presentation to council, included in the information given to councillors a report on a similar project undertaken successfully by the town of Waterloo.

Mittelmann emphasized that the choice is not between having a beautiful lawn through the use of disease-causing pesticides or having a lawn full of weeds and dandelions without them.

A number of studies, as well as the practical example of not just Waterloo but also next-door North York, shows the steps that can be taken to produce a healthy lawn: leaving the grass three inches long ("this reduces heat stress and enables deep root growth," Mittelmann said), using sharp blades so as not to damage the grass, using alternate mowing patterns, fertilizing with organic fertilizers, aerating the soil and overseeding.

The group are concerned, because it is not enough to use these precautions on their own lawns, as pesticide residue can drift from one property to another or from a park to nearby homes.

Also, Mittelmann said, even if signs are posted warning children to stay off the grass, the signs are frequently knocked down, stolen of just not noticed.

"Besides, even if it says it is safe to walk on the grass after a day, studies show that the residue remains for a lot longer than that."

The chemicals also get onto toys and garden furniture. "And we all know that toys go into mouths and food goes onto picnic tables and into our bodies."

Besides, Mittleman said, people have to realize that children are smaller and thus are affected faster, by less.

The group is under no illusions that the problem can be solved in one season. "But we should look at least at reducing the use of pesticides."

Speaking pragmatically, Mittelmann noted that there is a fiscal incentive to use more natural methods of gardening.

"The Waterloo study showed a 27 percent increase in the amount of green space, along with a 28 percent reduction in costs."

But mostly, the parents are concerned about the dangers of pesticides indicated in recent studies — more childhood leukemia, perhaps non-Hodgkins lymphoma, and other cancers and illnesses.

Mittelmann likened a pesticide-maintained lawn to an athlete on steroids. "They both look magnificent, but that doesn't mean they are healthy."

Religious, nationalists win big in Israel vote

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israeli Correspondent

TEL AVIV – On the surface, it was a referendum on the peace process. But at a deeper level, the election in Israel was about another issue: To whom does the country belong?

The losers in this tug of war were the secular liberal Israelis who regard themselves as the rightful heirs of Zionism. And the winners? Religious and nationalistic Israelis who wish to see a return to Jewish tradition, a rejection of Western values and influences, and a new brand of feistier Zionism.

"It's the end of the Zionism that our grandparents stood for," lamented a Labor party stalwart.

The evidence of the battle is everywhere. In the streets of Tel Aviv, bastion of secular liberalism, the same refrain is heard over and over again: "I feel as though I no longer belong in this country."

At a post-election rally of Peres supporters, a large banner read: "Will the last one to leave the country please turn off the light."

"Many of my left-wing friends say that if they were younger they'd leave," said Ike Mizrahi, a Likud supporter who is incensed at this response. Mizrahi published an ad in a Hebrew newspaper offering to drive Leah Rabin to the airport, following an interview in which she said she felt like "packing her bags and leaving."

But let there be no illusions. Had the left won this election, today's winners would be feeling the same sense of alienation. Just ask Karen Banks, an avid Likud supporter who came to symbolize the anguish of defeat for a few moments last Wednesday night. The 20-something campaigner broke down in tears when she heard the result of the exit poll predicting a slim win for Peres. Her tearful face graced the newspapers and television screens of the country. What did she feel at that moment?

"As though I no longer had a country," said Banks. "It was terrible."

But two days later, she was celebrating Bibi's victory at Beit Jabotinsky, the Likud headquarters in Tel Aviv. For Banks, as for many, the election signalled more than a change in Israel's negotiating positions with the Arabs. "I see it as a return to Zionism. And 23 mandates for the religious parties is the best thing that ever happened to this country," said Banks, a secular Tel Aviv University student. "It's going to bring back Judaism to Israel."

Banks is not alone in that view. Many non-religious Israelis are relieved about the religious victory, regarding it as a much-needed return to tradition. This is partly a backlash against four years of Labor-Meretz rule and a reaction to the seeming erosion of values among secular youth.

"I don't like to see youth sitting around aimlessly on Friday nights eating hamburgers at McDonald's. Someone has to bring back tradition and safeguard Judaism," said Avi Sharbit, a secular ex-kibbutznik who lives in Givatayim and voted Likud.

Among poorer Sephardi Jews, the massive return to tradition has different roots.

"The great mistake of the Labor government was ignoring the third and fourth generations of Israelis living in poverty – most of whom are Sephardi," said social critic Iris Mizrachi. "When you take away people's respect and condemn them to poverty, they turn to the one place where they can find dignity – God. The Shas party understood that very well."

To former MK Elyakim Ha'Etzni, a Kiryat Arba lawyer, "the Jewish National Camp ... is attempting to salvage the Jewish soul which may still flicker somewhere inside the new Israeli of Jewish origin."

Ha'Etzni, wrote in the Jerusalem Post that he regards the election as a "push forward toward the final showdown ... in a momentous kulturecampf."

The irony is that Netanyahu, the man who staged Israel's most American-style election campaign, has become the savior of Jews who shun Western influence. By peppering his speeches with phrases like "with the Lord's help," and staging visits to the Western Wall, the secular Netanyahu has come to be equated with Judaism and tradition.

"With the Lord's help – Netanyahu," read the bumper stickers on Chabad cars.

Secular liberals view all this with alarm. It is not just because they fear that cinemas will be closed down on Friday nights. What is much more frightening to them is what the religious-right victory says about their country and their image of themselves. They feel disinherited.

"This is the end of the Zionism that our parents and grandparents believed in," said a longtime Labor party supporter, whose family were among the founders of Rosh Pina.

"It's not just a change of government. It's a change in culture, a culture we don't share," said Avi, a Tel Aviv software designer.

The losers in this battle view themselves as the last holdouts of a Western, liberal tradition that espouses rationalism, respect for human rights and openess to the wider world. They believe they have been defeated by representatives of a xenophobic, medieval Jewish culture based on mysticism, ignorance and intolerance.

EL AL
THE NATIONAL CARRIER OF THE STATE OF ISRAEL

Political landscape transformed

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

With last week's general election, one of the closest in Israel's history, the political landscape in Israel has been transformed. Israel has lurched to the right, and a new coalition government, spearheaded by Benjamin Netanyahu of the Likud, is on the cusp of governing the country.

In Israel's first direct election, Netanyahu, 46, defeated Shimon Peres, the 72-year-old Labor party incumbent, by less than one percentage point. His victory underscored the fact that Israel is an extremely polarized society, a house divided in terms of religious observance, ethnic background and ideological beliefs.

Netanyahu squeaked through by gaining the overwhelming support of right-wing and religious Jewish voters. Altogether, 55 percent of the Jewish electorate cast their ballots for Netanyahu.

In the Knesset race, the major parties, Labor and Likud, lost considerable strength, while the religious lists, particularly Shas and the National Religious party, won their greatest number of seats since the establishment of the state, a total of 23.

This configuration gave two new small parties with totally different agendas — Avigdor Kahalani's The Third Way (four seats) and Natan Sharansky's Israel b'Aliyah (seven seats) — enormous clout, as well as the balance of power. With these parties onside, Netanyahu, a secular nationalist, should have no trouble cobbling together a government which commands a whopping 68 Knesset seats.

The Labor party was never so lucky. The late Yitzhak Rabin, Peres' predecessor, brought Shas into his left-of-centre government and thus enjoyed a fairly comfortable advantage. But after Shas defected, the Labor coalition, with the outside backing of Arab parties, could muster no more than a majority of one in parliament, just enough to ratify Phase II of the Oslo peace accord last year.

Netanyahu, albeit by the slenderest of margins, has been given a mandate to re-evaluate and possibly reinterpret the Oslo accords, which have been bruised by a deadly series of terrorist incidents.

In this sense, the election was a referendum on the entire peace process, which was reinvigorated when Israel and the PLO signed the historic Declaration of Principles in September 1993.

The Oslo agreements, which most Israelis supported, ushered in an unprecedented era of cooperation between Israel and the Palestinians, prompted Morocco, Tunisia, Jordan, Mauritania, Oman and Qatar to forge official relations with Israel, and ended Israel's diplomatic isolation. But by the same token, Oslo triggered an outbreak of stabbings, shootings and suicide bombings which killed some 200 people and caused many Israelis to wonder whether peace without security was worth pursuing. From this point of view, Peres — who will probably be replaced as leader of the Labor party after a decent interval — failed to convince most Israelis that peace was the answer to terrorism.

Netanyahu and his chief allies, Rafael Eitan of Tsomet and David Levy of Gesher, were against the Oslo agreements from the start, largely because they oppose the Labor party's land-for-peace formula. In practice, however, Netanyahu has grudgingly accepted Oslo as a fait accompli, provided he is free "to reduce the dangers to the future and security of Israel resulting from these agreements."

Last week, in an attempt to burnish his image and to allay fears that he will dismantle the Oslo accords, Netanyahu issued a statement affirming his commitment to the peace process.

Nevertheless, serious questions remain with respect to Netanyahu's policy toward the Palestinians and Syria.

If Netanyahu is true to the Likud's platform, he will rescind the freeze on the construction of new settlements in the territories, drastically reduce the powers of the Palestine Authority (PA), send the army into Palestinian self-rule areas when necessary to combat terrorism, refuse to countenance the creation of a Palestinian state, sit tight in Hebron and close certain Palestinian institutions in East Jerusalem.

These moves will doubtless escalate tension between Israel and the PA and probably chill Israel's relatively warm relationship with Jordan. And whether they will diminish terrorism is debatable.

Netanyahu also intends to retain the Golan Heights, which the Labor party was willing to trade in exchange for real peace. If he hews to this position, there will be two probable consequences: Israel's on-again-off-again bilateral talks with Syria will blow up, and the Syrians will step up their operational support of Hezbollah in southern Lebanon. Last week's death of four Israeli soldiers in the town of Maryajoun, the victims of roadside bombs, can be seen as a not-too-subtle message from Damascus that Lebanon is still a killing field.

Canadian leaders congratulate new PM

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has extended its congratulations to Benjamin Netanyahu on his election as prime minister of Israel.

"We congratulate Mr. Netanyahu on becoming the first individual ever directly elected as prime minister of Israel," said CJC president Goldie Hershon. "As Jewish community leaders, we have always supported the democratically elected government of Israel. We do not support particular parties or candidates.

"As the only true democracy in the Middle East, Israel has a vibrant election process which we respect. Its leaders are truly chosen by the people."

Herson also complemented Labor leader Shimon Peres on his campaign. "CJC has had the privilege of meeting with both Mr. Peres and Mr. Netanyahu," she said. "We believe that both individuals share the goal of peace in the Middle East."

OTTAWA — Stephen Victor, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) has extended congratulations to Benjamin Netanyahu, prime minister-elect of Israel, on his election victory.

"The overwhelming turnout of eligible voters is testament to the strength and vibrancy of the Israeli political system. We're heartened by your commitment to pursue the peace process with security for the people of Israel and we trust that the promotion of good relations with Israel's Arab neighbors and the Palestinians will continue to grow.

"We wish you well in your efforts, both to form a coalition government and to pursue peace. The Canadian Jewish community looks forward to maintaining close and strong ties with Israel under your leadership."

"We congratulate Benjamin Netanyahu on his narrow election victory. After a short but intensive and divisive campaign which clearly demonstrated that there are different visions of the path the government of Israel should pursue to achieve lasting peace, the democratic process has spoken.

"We acknowledge the tireless efforts of outgoing Prime Minister Shimon Peres in service of the State of Israel and in the pursuit of a peaceful resolution of the conflict in the Middle East. He played a major role in launching the current peace process, for which he has been recognized with the Nobel Peace Prize."

New PM calls for unity

"I turn to the whole population of Israel, those who voted for me and those who did not vote for me. I say to you that I intend to be the prime minister of everyone," the Likud leader said.

Turning to the Arab leaders, Netanyahu pledged to continue the peace process, saying, "I said that peace begins at home, but it has to be continued abroad. We intend to further the process of dialogue with all of our neighbors to reach a stable peace, a real peace, a peace with security."

Then, in a reference which brought prolonged shouts of acclamation, Netanyahu quoted from Psalms, "The Lord will give strength to his people, the Lord will bless his people with peace."

The speech, which was delivered while the entire Likud Knesset delegation – plus former Likud prime minister Yitzhak Shamir and Netanyahu's wife, Sara – sat on the podium, was punctuated with religious references.

"Tonight I extend my hand in peace to all the Arab leaders and to our neighbors, the Palestinians," Netanyahu said. "I call upon you to join us, to walk in the path of real peace, in security for all of us, for all peoples of the region.

"The government we will form in a few days, with God's help, will strengthen the peaceful relations that have already been established with the Jordanian kingdom and with Egypt, and will continue the negotiations with the Palestinians," he said.

"And we will also work to further peace deals and coexistence with other Arab states. I call on them also to join the circle of peace," Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu also addressed the fears of the non-religious about the rise of the religious parties. Early in his address, he said the status quo must be preserved, and toward the end of the speech he returned to the theme, saying, "I am committed to the values of law and democracy, just as I am committed to the values of eternal Israel, and there is no contradiction between the two. I am committed to the order of law in our land, just as I am committed to Jewish identity, and there is no contradiction between the two."

After thanking his supporters, and then his wife, Netanyahu turned to Shimon Peres. "I want to express tonight another thank you to a man who has done much for the State of Israel, I want to express tonight appreciation to Shimon Peres."

As he said this, the crowd erupted into a chorus of boos. Netanyahu shook his finger and nodded his head disapprovingly and some of the boos changed to cheers.

"The battle is behind us. Now we are in a different era," Netanyahu continued, "an era of unity for all the people. I want to say something about Mr. Peres. We had our disagreements, we had strong disagreements, but no one among us should forget the important contributions that Mr. Peres has made to the State of Israel."

This time the audience burst into cheers.

The Israeli vote took place on the same day as the election in British Columbia of a "39 percent premier." That experience demonstrated, yet again, the weaknesses of our own "first past the post" system, in which a minority of the popular vote can grant a party a significant majority in the legislature – prompting the Globe and Mail to question whether some form of proportional representation might not be a fairer system for Canada. The democratic process in its various permutations is always imperfect, but its results must be respected.

The vote for Israeli prime minister was, in essence, a referendum on the peace process. But not in the conventional sense. The vote was not for or against the process, but rather on how it should be conducted.

The ground beneath the debate shifted early in the campaign, when in response to polls showing Israelis' support for the Oslo process, Benjamin Netanyahu declared that he would not turn the clock back, but would seek peace with security. He knew that the majority of Israelis supported the disengagement, but that they were also gravely concerned about their personal security and the pace of peace.

From that moment on, both Peres and Netanyahu wooed the centre vote with sometimes almost indistinguishable promises of "peace with security" and "security with peace."

Although Yitzhak Rabin's name was hardly invoked during the election campaign, his legacy was present throughout. If Netanyahu has said repeatedly that he will continue the peace process, it is because Rabin convinced his people that "this is not so easy" but also that "the time for peace has come."

And the tragic circumstances of Rabin's death serve as a constant reminder to Israelis of the fragility of their young democracy in the face of its deep divides – as reflected in the election results.

The task of any new prime minister is to lead his people through the daunting decisions they face in a way that preserves sufficient common ground for the nation to march confidently into the future. Given the fractured nature of Israel's society, its challenge is not how to agree, but rather, how to disagree.

Hebron redeployment delayed

BY NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – When and how Israeli forces in Hebron will be redeployed will not be decided until prime minister- elect Benjamin Netanyahu takes office.

The outgoing government of Prime Minister Shimon Peres said Sunday that it would not act on carrying out the redeployment, which was expected to take place by mid-June.

In a statement issued after its weekly meeting, the Cabinet reiterated its commitment to the peace accords with the Palestinians, including the planned redeployment in Hebron, but said that it would let the government being formed by Netanyahu decide how to proceed.

"The matter will be for the incoming government to deal with, based upon Israel's international commitment to the Interim Agreement, and to the status of the understanding reached with the Palestinian Authority," the statement said.

Hebron is the last of seven West Bank population centres to be handed over to Palestinian self-rule under the terms of the agreement signed in September in Washington.

Israel postponed the redeployment, originally scheduled to take place in March, after a series of Hamas suicide bombings in February and March.

The Peres government reached an understanding with the Palestinian Authority to carry out the redeployment from 85 percent of Hebron after Israel's elections. Israeli troops would remain in the districts where some 400 Jewish settlers live.

In preparation for the expected movement of Israel troops, international observers began to arrive in the town in mid-May.

But over the weekend, Likud Knesset member Uzi Landau said it was likely that the new government would delay the redeployment in Hebron.

However, Netanyahu was quoted as saying that only he would decide what would be done there.

Israeli security sources were quoted as warning that any delay in the redeployment could lead to an increase in terror attacks.

Meanwhile, the head of the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic security agency, expressed satisfaction with the level of cooperation between Israeli and Palestinian security forces in combating terror.

Reporting to the Cabinet, Ami Ayalon said the cooperation had helped security forces thwart dozens of planned terrorist attacks in recent months.

Such cooperation also was key in last month's capture of Hassan Salameh, the No. 2 man in Hamas' military wing, he said.

Salameh, who helped plan and carry out the Feb. 25 suicide bombings in Jerusalem and Ashkelon and the March 3 bombing in Jerusalem, was apprehended after Israeli soldiers stopped his car at a checkpoint in Hebron.

The soldiers shot and wounded Salameh, but he managed to escape.

Palestinian security forces helped in his capture later at the hospital to which he had fled.

Ayalon said Salameh's interrogation had helped security forces uncover much of the military infrastructure of Hamas in the West Bank. As a result, Israeli forces apprehended eight Hamas terrorists and Palestinian security forces captured six.

BY RUTH E. GRUBER
Jerusalem Telegraphic Agency

ROME – Revelations by former Nazi SS Capt. Erich Priebke, on trial here for his involvement in a 1944 massacre, have led Italian judges to seek another former SS officer for his alleged role in the affair.

Investigators want to question former SS Maj. Karl Hass, who they believe took part in the murder of 335 civilian men and boys in the Ardeatine Caves near Rome.

After Priebke, 83, gave an interview to an Italian magazine last month, it was discovered that Hass, now in his 80s, has been living near Milan.

Hass, based in Rome from 1943 to 1944, was implicated in the Ardeatine Caves massacre in testimony given after the war by the Rome SS Cmdr. Herbert Kappler, but all traces of him were lost.

Military Judge Giuseppe Mazzi has ordered the investigation against Hass reopened.

In the interview last month, Priebke said he had met with Hass in Rome in 1978.

The newspaper Corriere della Sera on Sunday published photographs of a residency permit issued to Hass in the town of Albiate, near Milan, and of his house and its doorbell with Hass' name on it.

The Ardeatine Caves massacre was ordered by the Nazi command March 24, 1944, in retaliation for an attack by Italian partisans that killed 33 German soldiers the day before.

Canada-Israel Business Awards:

Israeli investments are economically sound

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the five Canadian companies honored here recently for their Israel-linked business initiatives, the bottom line is the same.

"It's not a matter of charity, it's a matter of economics," said Alberto Garfunkel of the bank's New York office, when presenting the Bank Hapoalim Award to Claridge Israel Inc., the largest private foreign investor in Israel.

Claridge's initial 1988 investment of $100 million (US) in Israeli business has grown in value to over $400 million, Garfunkel noted. Under the controllership of Charles Bronfman and Jonathon Kolber, Claridge counts among its Israeli investments Teva Pharmaceuticals, Osem (Israel's largest food manufacturer) and the Jerusalem Report magazine.

"When you combine strong economic growth with a shortage of investment capital, the returns you can earn are superior," said Claridge's Mark Smith, accepting the award. "We are there solely for profit. It's not in any way a philanthropic activity, and we continue to be there in a big way."

Bank Hapoalim and the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and Industry co-sponsored the first annual Canada-Israel Business Excellence awards, held at the Inn on the Park. Over 500 people attended the event.

Other winners were:

• Global Upholstery Co. Inc., which received the Price Waterhouse Award for outstanding achievement by a Canada-Israel joint venture. The Downsview-based manufacturer of office furniture, of which Teknion Furniture Systems is a subsidiary, employs over 200 people in Israel. After 20 years of doing business with Israel, including import and export, Global's Saul Feldberg says, "We have always been profitable."

• Reikh International Limited received the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce and Industry Award for outstanding entrepreneurship. The company pioneered the use of Canadian-style building systems in Israel and has recently become active in introducing Canadian marketing concepts into the Israeli retail food sector, in partnership with Israel's Elite Industries.

• Signatel, a provider of data communications products, won the Ambassador's Award for success in importing from Israel. The company has been the exclusive distributor here for Tel Aviv-based RAD Data Communications since 1984.

• Satellite technology company Telespace Ltd. received the Air Canada Award for outstanding achievement in the service industry. Telespace has played a significant role in the development of Israel's space program.

Keynote speakers at the evening reception included Arthur Eggleton, minister of International Trade; Jehudi Kinar, consul general of Israel; Yael Varsano-Barzilay, Israel's economic consul to Canada; and Henri Rothschild, president of the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Foundation.

Danforth fundraiser focuses on Sephardi culture

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The place to be on May 26 was the Danforth.

Over 1,200 people crammed into the Danforth Music Hall for a gala evening of film, flamenco dance and a mix of Sephardi, Spanish and French music, a fundraiser for the newly established Riverdale Jewish Community Centre.

The evening focused on Judeo-Spanish history and the intricate ties between Sephardi and Spanish cultures. With equal numbers of Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews in attendance, some audience members commented that Sephardi culture been not previously been showcased in Toronto in such a large venue.

Flamenco dancer Esmeralda Enrique, guitarist Aaron Skitri and Sephardi vocalist Charly Sibony were the featured artists. Media personality Ralph Benmergui, host of CBC Newsworld's noon-time talk show Benmergui Live, was the surprise guest host.

Benmergui, a Sephardi Jew of Moroccan descent, cried during a private viewing of Expulsion and Memory, he told the audience. "It reminded me of everything I had come from. I am very proud of my Sephardi heritage."

He spoke about coming to Canada at the age of two and growing up within the tightly-knit Sephardi community. He also joked about some of the differences between the Sephardi and Ashkenazi cultures. "How come all your (Ashkenazi) food looks brown?" he quipped. "And all the foods begin with K — kugel, knaidelach, kreplach, kishke, knishes ..."

The audience swayed and clapped during Sibony's vocal numbers — Los Bilbilicos in traditional Ladino and Paris tu m'as pris dans tes bras by Enrico Macias. Sibony was accompanied by Skitri on guitar and Eric Ifrah on keyboards.

Skitri's four guitar solos reflected virtuosity in style and technique. During his final solo, Valse Corse by J. Solano, the audience clapped enthusiastically.

A CITY MUSEUM WORTHY OF JERUSALEM

"Whoever did not see Jerusalem in all her glory never saw a beautiful city." (Babylonian Talmud, Succah 51 B)

Trademark elements of the famous cityscape, the Citadel and Tower have a past almost as convoluted and rich as that of the city itself. Like most architectural structures that embody history, they are protean, changing shape regularly down the ages. They go back a long way but not quite as far back as King David; the association arose through a misreading of Josephus.

According to local lore, the Citadel was first constructed by King Herod two millenia ago. This, too, stretches the truth a bit, since the enormous 40-metre-high building that Herod raised was later razed in its entirety and probably had little in common with the present structure.

The Citadel as it exists today owes its form to a succession of medieval tenants – some Crusader Kings, the Muslim warrior Saladin, the Mameluke sultan Malik an-Nasir – and to Suleiman the Magnificent, who made renovations and additions around 1538. The minaret was added in 1655.

Of tremendous strategic importance, the site served successively as a Roman, Muslim, Crusader, Mameluke and Turkish military bastion and barracks.

From the days of the 10th Roman Legion until the collapse of the Ottoman Empire, only soldiers and generals had benefit of its commanding views over the Old City.

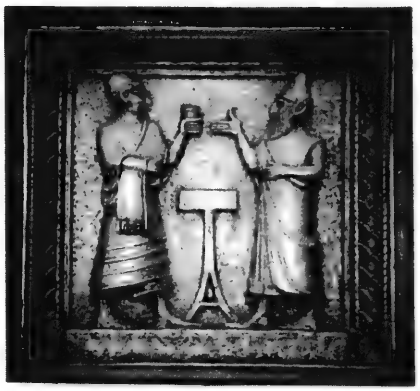
It was the city's most dramatic moment in 400 years. During the British mandate, the Citadel and Tower were restored and for the first time, treated appropriately as sites of tremendous cultural and historic significance. The Citadel became a venue for art shows, concerts and other cultural activities.

The Citadel and Tower again became an army outpost after the Jordanians took over the Old City in 1948. The art shows and concerts ceased as Jordanian Legion snipers manned the turrets. They fled when Israel captured the Old City and reunited Jerusalem in 1967.

Then, under the aegis of the Israeli and municipal governments and many private sponsors, there ensued a massive restoration of the Citadel and Tower, followed by the site's logical transformation into the Museum of the History of Jerusalem.



Plaque depicts the meeting of Abraham & Melchezedik

The Museum, which opened in 1989, offers an assortment of architectural gardens, displays, dioramas, holograms, maps, models and videos that illuminate Jerusalem's fascinating history from the Canaanite period onward. The views of the Old City are breathtaking and unsurpassed within the Old City.

A 14-minute animated film tells the city's story, as it masterfully juxtaposes the images and icons of its turbulent checkered history. One encounters models of the Second Temple, the Dome of the Rock, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the city itself at various periods. Downstairs in some kind of crypt is the 19th-century zinc model of Jerusalem, exact in every detail, that Hungarian artist Stephan Illes rendered in 1873.

A plaque depicts the meeting of Abraham and Melchezedik, the mysterious priest-king of Jerusalem whose private relationship with God, unlike Abraham's, was lost to history.

Illuminated charts explain the city's water system at the time of King Hezekiah, when water was piped in from a spring outside the walls.

As might be expected, the museum contains the likenesses of a passing parade of characters who once walked Jerusalem's streets. From the ancient municipal annals come Hebrew prophets and kings, Hellenistic Jews, Roman emperors and centurians, Christian saints and sages, Byzantine rulers, Knights Templar, Muslim warriors, Mameluke mercenaries, modern Zionists – the list goes on.

The Tower of David Museum of the History of Jerusalem is a logical starting point for exploring and appreciating the Jewish capital. It took nearly 3,000 years, but Jerusalem finally has a museum worthy of itself. A sound and light show is offered on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday evenings in summer.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

Twenty Years On The Air: Zelda Young, the Canadian radio and TV personality who has been producing shows on Jewish themes for the last 20 years, credits her father, Sam Yuchtman, for giving her a direction.

"My father was one of the early pioneers who created a Jewish radio presence in 1948," says Young, whose highly recognizable voice is heard in both Toronto and Vancouver. "He was a visionary who dedicated his life to the preservation and renewal of cultural vibrancy for the Jewish community in Canada. I am proud to continue on with his vision."

Young is producer and host of Shalom, a Jewish program heard in Toronto on CHIN FM 100.7 weekdays from 10 to 11 a.m., and on CHIN AM 1540 from 8:30 to 10 a.m. Since last September, her Vancouver program has been heard Sundays from 9 to 10 a.m. on CHMB 1320 AM.

Young's radio programs combine Israeli, local and international news, interviews with Jewish leaders and prominent rabbis, entertainment news, B'nai Brith reports, various features including health and financial planning and a selection of music from Israeli artists, liturgical and traditional.

Her television show Tapestry, which aired for eight years until 1993 on CITY-TV in Toronto, offered a similar mix of programming.

Safire's Rules for Writers: This being a slow week for Jewish arts, we are pleased to bring you this satirical advice on writing from American writer William Safire:

"Remember to never split an infinitive. The passive voice should never be used. Do not put statements in the negative form. Verbs have to agree with their subjects. Proofread carefully to see if you words out. If you reread your work, you can find on rereading a great deal of repetition can be avoided by rereading and editing.

"Don't overuse exclamation marks!! Place pronouns as close as possible, especially in long sentences, as of 10 or more words, to their antecedents.

"Writing carefully, dangling participles must be avoided. If any word is improper at the end of a sentence, a linking verb is. Take the bull by the hand and avoid mixing metaphors. Avoid trendy locutions that sound flaky.

"Everyone should be careful to use a singular pronoun with singular nouns in their writing. Always pick on the correct idiom. The adverb always follows the verb. Last but not least, avoid cliches like the plague; seek viable alternatives."

Business Profile

Deborah Weinstein and Judy Lewis of Strategic Objectives:

Public relations firm wins international acclaim

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At precisely 3:10 the door to Judy Lewis' tastefully decorated office opens quietly, and her assistant lets her know that she (Lewis) has five minutes before she must leave to take her children to an appointment.

"Because I have great staff, I can leave," says Lewis, executive vice-president of Strategic Objectives, a 28-person full-service public relations firm whose clients include Consumers Gas, Kraft General Foods Canada Inc., the LCBO, Marks & Spencer and York University.

The two former journalists went into business for themselves in 1983 after working together as television producers for the CTV show Thrill of a Lifetime.

They demand the same loyalty, honesty and integrity from their staff that they expect in a family situation.

"We work together, which is how a functional family works," said Weinstein. "In a good family you can discuss problems and bring them to a successful resolution."

The fortysomething heads of the firm have successfully blended family values with perfectionistic professionalism. The reception area of their 7,000-square-foot Front Street East offices stands as testament, with over a dozen prestigious PR awards attractively displayed.

The Geneva, Switzerland-based International Public Relations Association's Golden World Award for marketing a new product was one of two industry awards Strategic Objectives received this year. It recognized the firm's 1995 national program supporting the launch of Black Photo Corp.'s Memories Magic Digital Imaging service.

A 1994 anti-violence campaign for The Body Shop of Toronto earned them four awards, including a United Nations award for which they competed against 142 other entries from 30 countries. Their campaign raised more than $100,000 for violence-prevention programs.

Although they work out of one Toronto-based office, their almost two dozen accounts range in scope from local to international.

Lewis and Weinstein have earned their success. "It was hard starting with no money," recalls Lewis of the early days when she and her sister worked alone in a "teeny-tiny" office on the wrong side of the tracks.

Originally from Montreal, the sisters both moved to Toronto in the early 1980s. Their brother, David, works at the firm as account manager.

To build their business, Weinstein and Lewis have always targeted innovative companies whose ideas were in line with their own. Their areas of expertise include video production, trade and fashion shows, news conferences, media training and Internet Web site consultation.

These days most of their business is by referral. "We're careful about what we take on. Our obsession with consistently better results prohibits us from taking on a ton of business," said Weinstein.

The firm is selective not only about the number of its clients (currently just under two dozen), but also about the type of project it will undertake. "We don't take on projects [for which] we can't accomplish clients' objectives," explained Weinstein. "Then we're in a no-win situation. There's always a reality check."

Such checks include research into perceptions of the potential client and its industry.

Over 60 percent of projects involve changing public perception of a company. After signing on as a Strategic Objectives client, Kmart Canada Ltd. was featured in — of all places — the fashion pages of Chatelaine magazine.

It was a challenge, admitted Weinstein, to present value-priced discount shopping as a viable alternative in a downsized economy, but the message was one the public "wanted and needed to hear. The actual positioning wasn't that difficult."

Every project is a challenge, Weinstein maintains.

One of the most challenging projects Lewis has worked on was the information letter of the Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association.

"What will people remember me for? It's not for being a size 10," said Lewis with a laugh, "but hopefully it will be for taking some very complex issues and bringing them to people in a way so they can actually understand them and make their own decisions."

The concept of informed consumer decision-making is a relatively new one in the world of public relations. "The old rule would be to force that message down," said Lewis. "We believe the best customer is the most informed customer, and our clients agree with that."

Lewis has begun to get that message out to a younger and younger audience. At a recent public school speaking engagement, she showed teenage students a two-page ad in Chatelaine and asked them how much they thought it would cost. To their surprise, she told them the price was in the tens of thousands of dollars.

The students were even more surprised to learn that equivalent editorial space was not only free, it had greater credibility.

Not that advertising doesn't have its place. Certain types of messages don't lend themselves to PR, she said.

And "free" editorial space doesn't come cheap. An annual program by Strategic Objectives will cost a firm $60,000 and up. An individual PR project, such as a local product launch, starts at around $20,000, and "the sky's the limit" says Weinstein.

"If someone said, 'I want you to do PR on the fact we have the cheapest teddy bears for sale,' it would probably be better for advertising," said Lewis, "but if you want to talk about quality ..." Her implication is obvious.

As former journalists, both of whom began their careers at CBC Radio, Lewis and Weinstein know what will pass muster with editors, television and radio producers and ultimately with consumers. Their messages may also target other audiences: stockholders, legislators and, of course, clients themselves.

Although they now have two vice-presidents to round out their management team, Lewis and Weinstein retain the hands-on involvement that is the hallmark of many successful businesses. "Everything that comes out of Strategic has our involvement," said Lewis. "We check and monitor results on all activities on all accounts."

And they love it. "When I was a hard-nosed investigative news reporter on TV, I got a lot of satisfaction out of that, but I get a lot more satisfaction being behind the scenes and communicating strong positive messages that have the potential to influence behavior in a positive way and create jobs," said Weinstein.

Jiu-Jitsu fighter wins gold at championship scrap

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Joel Gerson loves a good scrap. Not only does he enjoy the competitiveness of butting heads with a like-minded opponent, he also loves the "adrenalin rush you get" when you throw a bigger man to the ground.

So imagine his joy when he handled a fighter almost 15 lbs heavier than him and took home the gold medal in the middleweight division of the recently concluded Canadian Open Jiu-Jitsu championships in Dundas, Ont.

Gerson was so confident he could handle his opponent that he even stretched out the gold-medal match a little, looking for the opportunity to end it with a submission hold. His patience paid off when he applied a painful armlock, part of his repertoire of joint-locks, throws, holds and chokes, that caused his opponent to "tap out" — indicate to the referee he wanted to submit by tapping the ground.

Gerson's been grappling with opponents for about eight years, when he first became interested in the martial arts to improve his ability to defend himself.

Although he first studied karate, he wanted something a little more practical in street situations so he signed up for a course in Israeli commando-style survival techniques taught by Moni Aizik at the Jewish Community Centre.

He followed Aizik when the former Israeli commando set up the Samurai Club Martial Arts & Fitness Centre, first as a student and later as an instructor.

Joel Gerson

Gerson, 21, was one of the Samurai Club's 10 gold medalists at the Canadian Jiu-Jitsu Championships. In addition to Gerson, other Jewish champs included Masha Kazakevich, Alex Tcherniaknovski and Vitaly Papsouev.

Gerson, a student at the University of Toronto, said he trained four to five times a week prior to the competition and last year, while attending McGill University, worked out with the Canadian Olympic judo team.

Jiu-Jitsu differs from judo by being more aggressive and lethal, Gerson said. Judo evolved from jiu-jitsu and can be considered the sport form of the martial art, he added. Jiu-Jitsu, on the other hand, is more effective in a street fight when you have to get down and dirty.

Even though he oozes with confidence about his ability, Gerson said he has yet to get in a real street scrap where he's had to use jiu-jitsu. He's too worried about a law suit or of hurting someone when he slams them to the pavement, he said.

Still, that didn't dissuade him from considering participating in the Extreme Fighting Championships at a Mohawk Reserve in Quebec recently. But he didn't become aware of the event until it was too late to sign up.

He regrets not having participated since the winner in his weight category earned $5,000 (US). The winner was a third-place finisher in the world kickboxing championships, but Gerson is confident he could have handled him. Kickboxers, he explained, don't know how to fight on the ground.

"I'd take a kick [if I had to], get in close and flip him to the ground," he said. "It's like a predator who takes his prey to the ground."

Once there, the advantage is his and he predicted he'd "finish it" at close quarters.

While down and dirty fighting is his forte, Gerson is looking forward to representing Canada in the more genteel art of judo at next summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Kazakevich, who's closing in on 21 years of age, is another Maccabiah hopeful from the Samurai Club. A native of Grodno, Belarus, Kazakevich won gold in the "up to 52 kg" class. To her credit, she defeated some male athletes to win the medal.

An instructor at the Samurai Club, Kazakevich is modest almost to a fault about her abilities. But Aizik says "she's one of the most talented kids I have. She's very good technically against bigger and stronger opponents."

Fireworks expected at Canada Day tourney

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It may not be the Thrilla' in Manilla or the Rumble in the Jungle, but there should be some pretty good on-the-field fireworks come July 1, Canada Day, when two Canadian softball teams butt heads with the Israeli nationals.

The occasion for the Canada Day celebration is a three-team tournament that will serve as a tune-up for the Israeli national squad as they prepare to represent the Jewish state at the World Softball Championships in Midland, Mich.

Maccabi Canada, winners of the gold medal in softball at the '93 Maccabiah Games in Israel, and a B'nai Brith (BB) all-star team will provide the competition for the Israeli nationals.

First pitch in the tournament, which will be held at Irv Chapley Park at Wilmington and Overbrook, will be at 9:00 a.m., while the championship game is set to begin at 3:00 p.m.

The event is more of a "friendship thing" than a duel-to-the-death baseball championship, said Brian Revin, organizer of the Maccabi team.

Maccabi will provide a pitcher for the BB stars to help make the event more competitive and it is helping to raise funds for the Israeli squad, he said.

While admission is free for the tournament, organizers hope to raise money through other means. Spectators will be offered souvenir tickets, there will be a beer garden, baseball contests, raffles and assorted hoopla to help round out the Canada Day celebration.

Meanwhile, Maccabi Canada is continuing to recruit new ballplayers for its softball team. Tryouts are scheduled for June 15 and 16 at Clanton Park, Bathurst and York Downs, beginning at 9:30 a.m.

Revin, who coached the '93 Maccabiah gold medal winners, expects to retain a nucleus of about six players from that squad. That means about nine places are open on the '97 team.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My beloved husband of 53 years passed away six months ago. Until then, I led a very active life. I fulfilled a number of roles (including that of caregiver for three years during his illness). I thought that I was coping rather well with my loss. We had no children; my social supports consist of my friends, who I try not to burden with my feelings.

Lately, I find myself struggling to concentrate on simple tasks. The other day, I went to the supermarket and left without my groceries. I am embarrassed to say this, but at times I am afraid that I am losing my mind. I need some advice on what to do about my situation.

F. W.

Dear F. W.,

Your letter reflects a caring, responsible individual who has experienced the recent death of your lifelong mate and the abrupt termination of your caregiving role. You state that you state that you do not wish to "burden" your friends with your feelings, yet by denying yourself the need to deal with your pain, you may be forfeiting your emotional well-being.

Regarding your concentration and memory problems, consult with your doctor in order to fully assess your health status. Keep in mind that grief reactions can have social, psychological and physical ramifications, including symptoms such as exhaustion, sleep disturbances, disorganization, confusion and lack of concentration. These are natural responses to a very stressful situation, and need not be a source of shame or embarrassment. Check your local social service agency for information concerning support groups for widowed seniors. Talking to others, who are experiencing similar reactions, will assist you to share your feelings, explore coping strategies and help you realize that you are not alone.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Toy pioneer honored by Canadian association

By PAUL LUNGEN

Ben Samuels shows off one of Regal Toys' "Collection Dolls" that was popular in the 1970s.

TORONTO — It's as obvious as the blond locks on Barbie's head or the inane smile on Ken's face — toys are a serious business.

Sure, you can jump on them, ride them, pretend with them, dress them up, put 'em in your bath or throw them out a window, but as any walk through Toy 'R Us will prove, there's a huge market for toys and assorted children's playthings.

One of the pioneers of the Canadian toy industry, Ben Samuels, was honored recently by the Canadian Toy Association (CTA), when he and his late brothers Solomon Frank (Sol) and Alexander (Alex) were inducted into the association's Hall of Fame.

The honor recognized their ground-breaking work, innovation, integrity and efforts to promote the Canadian toy industry.

For Samuels, who's closing in on 82 years of age, his start in the toy business was on the ground floor, or more specifically, sweeping up the ground floor. In 1928, at age 14, sweeping up was his first job at Reliable Toy Company, the business his older brothers had turned into a success from the time they founded it in 1920.

No stranger to hard work, Ben began pushing a broom and keeping the factory, then located on Phoebe Street near Queen, clean. Earlier he'd earned extra cash as a "newsie." In those days, you had to stake out a corner and fight for it, if need be. "If you weren't tough enough, you'd get beaten up," he said.

Samuels grew up on the family farm in Ponty Pool, "a Jewish Miami Beach" about 85 miles northeast of Toronto. To supplement its income, the family took in borders and convinced many that a blanket and a bed of straw would make for a real rustic experience, he recalled.

As a youth, Samuels was sent to Toronto to live with his older brother Sol and attend Harbord Collegiate. At the same time, he began to work in the company.

Sol was known for his salesmanship and he globetrotted the world looking for new markets, making inroads in Britain, South Africa, Australia and continental Europe.

Alex was the technical wiz, devising new and innovative ways of making the company's popular dolls.

From sweeping up, Ben made his way to assembly work and was eventually given a department to run. His first task was a difficult one — manufacturing a "crier" (the device that simulates a baby's crying).

"It was tough," Samuels recalled. "How do you start making criers? I got some help from my brothers and eventually set up a department as efficient as any in the operation. I put someone in charge of it and moved on."

In the 1930s, Reliable continued to expand despite the depression. People still wanted to get toys for their kids, Samuels said. Reliable continued as an innovator, foregoing the wood pulp composition commonly used in British-made dolls for a resin and starch mix that was put in a mould.

In 1941, it became the first company in Canada to use injection moulding technique. It also expanded its business to supply the military with bullet tips, bayonet scabbards and oil bottles.

Expanding its operations, it moved into a 100,000-square-foot space on Carlaw Avenue. Large retailers like Eaton's, the Bay, Metropolitan Stores and Woodwards were customers, as were small Jewish-owned chains in Quebec, Samuels said.

After the war, they continued to sell abroad. Reliable improved on others' products by making their dolls and toys lighter and more durable. Reliable was a pioneer in children's sand pails and in "Photo Squirts" — "cameras" that squirted water.

The 1950s were very successful — they cashed in on the hula hoop craze — but in 1959, Samuels left the firm and started his own business, Regal Toy. The company specialized in using rotational casting to make squeeze toys and employed nylon "hair" for dolls, that kept its curl and could be brushed and combed.

In 1979, Samuels, then 65, decided to sell the business at what turned out to be its peak value.

Alex died in 1966 and Sol in 1973.

Reliable and Regal were successful because "we stayed a step ahead of the competition," Ben said.

Not all their products were winners, however. He recalls one fiasco involving a water gun that used a steel spring. It worked at first but eventually rusted and made the guns useless. We should have used stainless steel, he said, adding about 25,000 guns had to be trashed.

At the end of Samuel's tenure, Regal's product line included "Canadiana dolls," plush toys that resembled Inuit, as well as northern wildlife like grizzly bears, foxes and beavers.

Dressable dolls were popular, as were "Wendy Walker," a musical clown (turn its nose and it's a music box), and a rideable duck and horse.

During his tenure in the business, Samuels served as president of the CTA and was involved in creating a safety code for toys.

Arabs warn of violence

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Arab leaders warned Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu this week that tension and violence would ensue in the region if the new Israeli government deviates from the "principles of the peace process."

But Israeli officials said the Arab leaders were prejudging the new government before it was formed and that they were disregarding repeated statements Netanyahu has made pledging his commitment to the process.

"It is unacceptable that the Arab leaders form an opinion and issue such a statement before the new government has even taken power," Israeli President Ezer Weizman said in remarks broadcast on Israel Radio.

After their weekend summit in Damascus, Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Saudi Arabia's Crown Prince Abdullah issued a joint statement calling on Israel to withdraw from all occupied territories.

The three warned that any departure by Israel from the land- for-peace principles of the peace process pursued by the outgoing Labor government would be considered a threat to return the region to "tension and violence."

They also called on Turkey to re-evaluate the military pact it signed with Israel in February.

That agreement, which provided for joint manoeuvres and Israeli training flights over Turkey, drew sharp criticism from several Muslim countries, including Egypt.

In another development, Assad met last Sunday with the Qatari foreign minister and asked that the Persian Gulf state freeze the low-level economic ties it forged with Israel in April.

Mubarak phoned Arab leaders, including representatives of Jordan, and the Gulf states, this week to invite them to a meeting June 21 to 23, where they will attempt to develop a unified stance regarding the new Israeli government.

Netanyahu refused to comment on the weekend Arab summit.

Netanyahu's cabinet appointments will also indicate the path his government will take to the peace process.

David Levy, head of the Gesher party, which merged with Likud in the Knesset race, was reported by Israel Television to be the likely candidate for foreign minister, a position he held in the Likud government led by Yitzhak Shamir. Likud Knesset member Yitzhak Mordechai, the recently retired head of the northern command who is the No. 2 person on the Likud Knesset list, is considered the lead candidate for defence minister, Israel Television reported.

Canada-Israel free trade delayed

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Implementation of the long-awaited Canada-Israel free trade deal, originally scheduled for July 1, will be delayed to Jan. 1, 1997, at the earliest, federal International Trade Minister Art Eggleton says.

Bureaucratic delays, mainly in Canada, and the Israeli election have combined to delay the pact, but Eggleton is hopeful it will be signed, sealed and delivered by next New Year's Day.

The foundation for the deal was laid in November 1994, when the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and Prime Minister Jean Chrétien shook hands on the agreement.

Art Eggleton

But that agreement still has to be signed by both countries, Eggleton says, and then the cumbersome Canadian legislative process will begin. First, the minister will put a bill before Parliament in this fall's session. Debates and hearings will follow and then the matter goes to the Senate, with royal assent as the final touch.

"I'm told the Knesset can do it in two weeks, so they're far more efficient," Eggleton chuckled in a wide-ranging interview at his York Centre constituency office recently.

Eggleton expects no change of heart from the new government of Benjamin Netanyahu. "All the signals we're getting from Israel are that there is wide support [for the deal]. It's just a matter of setting a date for the signing.

Olympics Controversy

WASHINGTON – With the opening ceremonies for the Summer Olympics less than six weeks away, the controversy over an officially recognized team from "Palestine" has sparked new protests.

A delegation of athletes from "Palestine," as the team is designated in the Atlanta Committee on the Olympic Games' official publications, is competing in the summer games.

The Anti-Defamation League has protested the choice of nomenclature to the International Olympic Committee.

Teacher Disciplined

PARIS – A French high school teacher is facing disciplinary proceedings for giving her students a physics test in which she asked them to calculate the amount of carbon monoxide needed to kill Jews during the Holocaust.

The teacher, who is reportedly Jewish, told the principal of the College des Sept Mares near Versailles that she had been giving the exercise to students for several years and that her intention was to denounce the Holocaust and fight those who deny that it took place.

Israel's Diplomatic Corps To Shift

JERUSALEM – Some members of Israel's diplomatic corps, including Israel's ambassador to the United States, have announced their intention to step down when the new Likud government comes to power.

Ambassador to the United States Itamar Rabinovich was among those who said he would end his tenure as a result of Benjamin Netanyahu's victory. Among the potential candidates for his post are Zalman Shoval and Moshe Arens.

Foreign Ministry sources said they expected Israel's consul general in New York, Colette Avital, to leave. Israel's ambassador to Jordan, Shimon Shamir, denied that he planned to leave his post.

Ora Namir, who resigned from the Knesset to be appointed ambassador to Beijing, said she had considered a scenario of serving under a Likud-led government before accepting the position.

Elazar Granot, a Meretz appointment to the top diplomatic post in South Africa, said he expected to leave.

Responsibility.

This has been a tradition in our family for four generations.

Federation promises 'new and bold' campaign

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though the grandchildren of Jewish immigrants are at the top of their professions and Jews have more influence now, Toronto Jews still feel "fragile" and worry about Jewish continuity.

That was the message from Jack Chisvin in accepting the Ben Sadowski Award of Merit at last week's annual meeting of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, held at the Koffler Centre.

Chisvin, a former president of the federation, recalled how he found his mother prostrate on the floor with grief after she learned that her remaining family in Belarus (then Byelorussia) had died in the Holocaust.

"That was the defining moment of my Judaism," he said.

Under pressure from his peers in Grade 3, Chisvin said, he joined in harassing a black boy and called him "Snowball."

"I realized that I, a target of racism, had become a racist."

Chisvin, who worked in 41 consecutive United Jewish Appeal (UJA) campaigns and was one of the founders of Project Renewal, concluded: "We will endure as Jews because we have a soul."

One of the winners of the federation's Shem Tov Awards was his daughter, Karen Chisvin, immediate past president of the Bloor Jewish Community Centre.

Sandra Brown was re-elected to her second term as Federation president and outlined a busy year ahead with emphasis on integrated fundraising.

A meeting highlight was the presentation of the Leadership Development Awards to two young people with widely contrasting backgrounds.

Heather Milstein, a social worker, spoke of the importance of Shabbat dinners in her traditional family and her summers at Jewish Camp Council locations. Chartered accountant Robert Furman spoke of the oppression he endured as a Jew in Odessa, his gratitude to the Toronto rabbi who welcomed him at a Passover seder when he arrived in Toronto at age 17, and to Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS), which met him at the train. Furman last week completed his term as president of JIAS Toronto.

Other Shem Tov winners were David Herlick from Senior Care; Harold Hertzman from Toronto Free Loan Casa; Jessica Pelt from Jewish Campus Services; and Dorothy Shoichet of the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

A new, six-minute video on the history and prospects of the Toronto Jewish community to be used in the UJA campaign won applause from the audience.

"It will be a new and bold campaign with the message of 'we believe' and community pride," said Howard English, communications director.

Toronto is one of the top five cities in North America in raising money for Jewish causes, said English. "The 'needs' appeal won't work any more, guilt won't work, and today's donors want to know how they benefit from the money they give."

Rabbi Irwin Witty, Jewish Board of Education director, who is retiring this year, gave a d'var Torah to open the meeting.

A series of spirited numbers by the Bialik Day School Choir marked the final appearance of Doron Ophir as the choir's director. Ophir is returning to Israel.

Pearl Babins is retiring after 15 years as executive secretary of the federation. Her service was acknowledged by Brown.

Baumel fights for MiAs' release

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As might be expected, Miriam Baumel gets very touchy when details about her son Zachary come up.

Although she's been keeping his cause alive for 14 years, ever since he and other Israeli soldiers were captured during the war in Lebanon, she steers interviewers to new topics when they probe too close.

He was captured 14 years ago so that would make him 36 now? she's asked.

"I operate at a certain even level. I just try to keep going. It's hard," she explains, as she changes the subject by drawing a biblical comparison to her son's fate.

Like the ancient Philistines, she says, Israel's Arab neighbors sometimes hold captives for years before exacting a price for their release. Syria has been known to hold captured Israeli Palestinians for between 12 and 20 years, she adds.

Although her son was captured in a military operation that went wrong and is now one of six Israeli MiAs (Missing in Action), Baumel is confident he's still alive, although the evidence she presents for that belief is sketchy.

Journalists renew fellowship at conference

The American Jewish Press Association (AJPA) has existed for more than half a century. As its name suggests, it is the professional association of the English-language Jewish media in the United States. Its membership consists of over 175 newspapers and magazines, in addition to individual journalists in the United States and Canada. The CJN is a member of the AJPA.

Its mandate is twofold: "to improve and upgrade the status of American Jewish journalism and to provide a forum for the exchange of ideas and cooperative activities among the American Jewish press."

Two weeks ago in San Francisco, the AJPA held its 52nd annual conference. I attended the conference on behalf of this newspaper. Approximately 80 people were there.

Like most conferences, its agenda was packed with both substantive and social gatherings. I attended five lectures/discussions. Space does not permit a comprehensive retelling or assessment of each. Therefore, I will provide the briefest of summaries.

Rabbi Joseph Telushkin spoke to the group on the subject Words That Hurt, Words That Heal. Not coincidentally, this happens also to be the title of his most recent book. It was a fitting presentation to a room full of journalists. He underscored for us the moral and ethical dimensions of our work.

Martin Kraar, the executive vice-president of the Council of Jewish Federations and Gary Tobin, director of the Maurice and Marilyn Cohen Centre for Modern Jewish Studies at Brandeis, headlined a session provocatively and somewhat rhetorically entitled: Is Jewish Communal Life Redundant? If I properly understood their presentations, the short answer to the rather large question of their title is yes, given the manner in which Jewish communal life is presently organized.

Kraar began his presentation by saying there are now, in 1996, "more Jews outside the loop than inside." By "loop" he meant affiliated Jewish life. The organizational structure which had served American Jewry so well for the past 100 years, namely, the federation system, must now adjust to the times and radically change.

Tobin spoke of a "re-visioning process" in which the very concept of Jewish community is redefined. But he did not, indeed could not, define it. And throughout his discussion, not even once, did he mention the word Judaism.

A panel of three experts, Nimrod Barkan, Israeli consul in San Francisco, Ori Nir, Ha'aretz correspondent on Palestinian affairs, and Prof. William Zev Brinner, chair, Middle East Studies at the University of California at Berkeley, provided an assessment of the still-then-unofficial results of the Israeli elections.

All three speakers agreed that Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu will want to maintain good relations with the United States. Thus, he would not act precipitously, despite some of the campaign rhetoric, to stymie the peace process. We must await to see his actual policies.

Nir observed, poignantly, that the elections exposed as a melancholy "misconception that the national trauma of the Rabin assassination would pull the people together. The belief that the peace process would be Rabin's legacy was proved to be wrong."

Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre in Los Angeles, spoke to the gathering on a subject which he cryptically called the meaning of Jewish destiny and Jewish memory. He called on us to be faithful to Jewish memory lest we be unable to hear "the sounds of the trains which took the Jews to the death camps."

Jews must never become complacent, he said. "Evil is bold and enthusiastic; as opposed to Good, which is hesitating and slow." During his presentation, he let it be known that King Hussein is a member in good standing of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre Museum of Tolerance.

Finally, Todd Oppenheimer of Newsweek Interactive spoke to us about the print media's panic to establish a presence on the Internet. He acknowledged publicly what many in the print media privately fear. Due to the influence of the computer, the younger generation is less inclined towards newspapers and magazines. As a result, many print media organizations are taking steps to find an approach to the younger reader by means of the Internet. He told us about Newsweek's recent efforts in this regard which he is spearheading.

The substantive sessions were instructive, informative and in varying degrees, both relevant and directly applicable to my work as editor. So too were the social sessions.

The professional peer network is a vital complex of friendships and fellowships which in the case of the AJPA, stretches literally, from coast to coast. We share information, exchange ideas and assist one another to take our respective publications to higher levels. All publications benefit as individual publications improve.

Moreover, and most important, the Jewish community as a whole benefits when Jewish newspapers are better able to serve their readers, to be more proficient in providing the news, to have wider choice in acquiring thoughtful analyses, commentaries or opinion pieces, and to have access to a professional sounding board of colleagues and friends against which questions are welcomed and advice is generously offered.

The most memorable of the social gatherings for me was the gala dinner at which the winners of the Rockower Awards for 1995 were announced. (Please refer to the news story about the awards elsewhere on this page.) The awards presentation has been a regular feature of the AJPA conference for the past 15 years. They are a statement of recognition by one's peers that good things are being done at the publication.

The CJN received awards in three categories out of a possible eight in which we were entered. The awards are a public acknowledgement of the dedication and commitment to excellence of the entire CJN team: our business, sales and editorial staffs in Montreal and Toronto, our outstanding correspondents across Canada, our award-winning correspondent in Israel, and our hard-working and creative production staff in Toronto.

I was very happy and very proud to "step up to the podium" on their behalf. And I was happier and prouder still, to be part of that team whose first commitment is to newspaper excellence and to the community which we serve as best as we can, on your behalf. MBD

CJN wins three Rockower Awards

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO – The CJN was recently awarded three Simon Rockower Awards for Excellence in Jewish Journalism.

The awards night for the 15th annual competition was featured at the American Jewish Press Association's Annual Conference held May 28 to 31 in San Fransico. The CJN was the sole Canadian Jewish newspaper to receive an award.

Leora Frucht won first place in the Boris Smolar Award for Excellence in International News or Feature Reporting for her article "Call us if you need help." Frucht's article featured the AVNET organization which helps victims of terrorist attacks and their families.

The Smolar Award was established in 1972 in honor of the late Boris Smolar, longtime editor-in-chief emeritus of the Jewish Telegraphic Agency.

Mordechai Ben-Dat, editor of The CJN, was awarded an Honorable Mention for Excellence in Editorial Writing. His winning piece was entitled "One of Us."

The CJN also received an Honorable Mention in the Excellence in Special Sections or Supplements category for its annual "L'Shana Tova" or Rosh Hashanah fall supplement.

The Simon Rockower Awards are sponsored by the American Jewish Press Association as an incentive for its members to continually improve the quality of their journalism. They were established by the endowment fund of I. Budd Rockower on the 100th anniversary of the birth of his late father, Simon Rockower. The awards honor articles, cartoons, features and graphic designs in Jewish journalism.

There were 14 different categories in which both a first and second place award were given. Honorable Mentions were awarded at the discretion of the judges. As well, some categories were divided into subsections for newspapers with a circulation over and under 15,000, and magazines.

The 1996 conference hosted over 80 participants. During the four days, editors, writers, publishers and advertising staffers attended workshops and general sessions dealing with a broad range of issues such as the Israeli election, free speech and the Internet.

Leach seeks more construction investment

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – The Ontario government plans to remove some taxes for first-time home buyers, eliminate some ineffective restrictions of the building code and revise the Landlord and Tenant Act, Al Leach, provincial minister of Municipal Affairs and Housing, told construction industry bigwigs at an Israel Bonds luncheon here recently.

"It's time to restore the crane as Ontario's official bird," he said, referring to the mechanized lifting machine common at construction sites.

Leach congratulated his audience of about 500 people from the Construction & Development Division of the State of Israel Bonds for financing so much new construction in Israel. "I'm also going to ask you to keep a few shekels in your pockets to invest in Ontario," he said, acknowledging that builders "have an integral part to play in our economic recovery."

Tax cuts instituted by the Harris government will stimulate the economy, create jobs and put more spending money into the hands of consumers, the former TTC boss said. "It would be nice to see people use it as down payments for new homes."

Ontario is cancelling the land transfer tax on new homes for first-time buyers and conducting a "red-tape review" of the building code to eliminate regulations that increase building costs without increasing health or safety. "Any restrictions to development that can't be justified are out," the minister said.

As well, the province is now completing a review to the Landlord and Tenant Act. "We've got some extremely good news coming and we're taking it on the streets this summer."

While still providing tenants with protection against stiff rent increases, the revised act will provide more incentives for new construction, he said. "The current system is just not working, not for landlords and not for tenants. Buildings are crumbling, no one is building new buildings and there's no incentive for landlords to invest because you can't get a reasonable return."

Leach used a biblical parable to persuade his listeners to have faith in the government's so-called common sense revolution, its blueprint for bringing the province back to prosperity.

"There's an old legend about Moses, that when he threw his wand into the Red Sea, there was no miracle, there was no parting of the water," he said. "Not until the first man jumped into the sea did the waters part. That's trust.

"While our government doesn't claim any divine inspiration, we need you to stand beside us. What we're looking for is the investor's vote of confidence. The Ontario government can and will deliver, so I can tell you, ladies and gentlemen, 'Jump in, the water's fine.'"

JIAS Toronto faces more cuts

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — As with other Jewish organizations, funding to the busiest branch of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada (JIAS) will likely be reduced just when more is expected of the agency.

That was the sombre message delivered last week to employees and leaders of JIAS's Toronto operations, at its annual meeting.

JIAS Toronto has adjusted to funding cuts and restructuring over the past two years, said retiring president Robert Furman. The agency saw its 1995-96 budget reduced by more than $140,000 over the previous year, but still balanced its $1.5-million budget, Furman noted.

And there's "no doubt" that funding to JIAS Toronto will be cut back even more in the coming year due to a "difficult" United Jewish Appeal campaign, he warned.

That comes just as the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is shifting more of its programs for immigrants to JIAS, Furman said.

Ultimately, it may lead to JIAS becoming a "one-stop shopping" agency for Jewish emigres, "but there will be no new budget for it."

Furman noted that JIAS Toronto's caseload this past year — 1,500 newcomers — increased by 20 percent over the previous 12 months.

But the number of immigrants from the former Soviet Union was down "considerably," likely a result of a tougher Canadian point system and higher application costs.

Nevertheless, Russians made up the largest part of the agency's caseload — 43 percent. They were followed by Jews from Ukraine (40 percent); Belarus (three percent); the Baltic states (three percent); Israel (two percent — most of them originally ex-Soviets); and the remainder from other ex-Soviet republics, South Africa and Eastern Europe.

Furman said JIAS Toronto has paid particular attention to the reunification of Bosnian Jewish families. The first Jews from Bosnia arrived in the city three years ago.

JIAS Toronto awarded its Jack Shindman Scholarship and Lou Poch Memorial Award to Inna Goldschmidt, a single mother originally from Russia, who graduated recently from Seneca College's accounting program.

Another Shindman scholarship went to Ruben Kamhi, a Sarajevo-born York University business student.

Kalejs questioned on reason for visiting Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Alleged Nazi war criminal Konrads Kalejs took the stand at his immigration hearing last week but he was not asked to testify about his wartime activities in the notorious Arajs Kommando.

Instead the 83-year-old Australian citizen was questioned about his status as a visitor to Canada. Kalejs said he came to Canada to be close to his common-law wife and stepdaughter, who live in Chicago, and to be in proximity to the United States where he intends to reopen his immigration case.

He said he would like to remain in Canada indefinitely until he is ready to clear his name.

Kalejs was deported from the United States because of his membership in the Latvian Auxiliary Security Police, more commonly known as the Arajs Kommando, which participated in the murder of more than 30,000 Latvian Jews.

After being deported from the United States in April 1994 and spending a short time in Australia, Kalejs moved to Canada in June 1994. The Canadian Immigration Department is attempting to deport Kalejs on two grounds: that he is not a legitimate visitor to Canada and that he was involved in war crimes as a member of the Arajs Kommando.

When asked last week by case presenting officer Vince Greco how long he intended to remain in Canada, Kalejs responded, "I may want to stay for a lifetime ... But I know it's impossible."

Under further questioning, Kalejs said he had not yet retained a U.S. lawyer to fight his case and that he is still searching for witnesses and documents that would clear him.

Justice Department lawyers Donald McIntosh and Bonnie Boucher explained that Kalejs was questioned only on his visitor status because they did not want his testimony on his involvement in alleged war crimes to go in as part of the government case. They said they would have more latitude to question him in cross-examination if he testifies later in his own behalf.

Kalejs' counsel, Win Thompson and Lloyd MaqIlquham, said they expected to call Kalejs as a witness later in the proceedings.

Meanwhile, government counsel continue to present their case. When confronted with statements from the record of his 1993 U.S. appeal case that suggested he had four homes and assets worth more than $1 million, Kalejs called that "a fantasy." He denied he paid a $750,000 cash bond to free himself during his legal battles, saying a friend posted the bond.

When asked how much he was worth, Kalejs responded: "I never counted my money."

Questioned further on his wealth, Kalejs said he was part owner of an apartment building in Illinois but that he had "no idea" how much his share was worth or how much revenue he received from it.

He said he didn't remember how much money he brought with him to Canada and he denied he returned to the United States under an assumed identity during his legal battles to dispose of his assets. He also denied suggestions by Greco that his U.S. assets had been frozen or that he had eluded capture by U.S. agents for six months.

In other evidence, RCMP handwriting expert Joel Harris said he examined specimen signatures from documents signed by Kalejs from the late 1950s through the '90s and compared them to questioned documents from 1944 that purport to be Kalejs' signature.

"I concluded there was some evidence that the writer of the known signatures wrote the signatures in the questioned signature list," he said. "There is some evidence to suggest common authorship."

The questioned signatures came from three lists compiled in February, March and April 1944 when members of the Latvian Security Police Battalion (which incorporated the Arajs Kommando) signed for cigarette rations. The known signatures were taken from Canadian and American immigration documents and Kalejs' Australian passport.

Harris pointed out similarities in the relative proportions of the letters in Kalejs' name, the strokes that connect letters, spacing, horizontal alignment and pen pressure.

He said there were some elements of difference in some of the signatures but that the similarities suggest they were written by the same person "even if I can't account for every variation."

Earlier, a 70-year-old Latvian woman, who did not want her identity revealed and was referred to as "Jane Doe," testified on videotape that as a teenage girl she met Kalejs in the small town of Talsi.

"He was just a normal man," the woman said. "Good looking at that time ... Normal, just normal."

The hearing continues on June 24.

TORONTO — The fallout from a letter sent to the Chief Justice of the Federal Court by a senior Justice Department official continues to spread.

Last week, lawyers representing alleged Nazi war criminal Josef Nemsila filed a court motion requesting a stay of proceedings in his deportation case.

The move came as Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen was in the midst of considering a stay motion in a case involving three other alleged Nazi war criminals — Johanne Dueck, Helmut Oberlander and Erichs Tobiass.

Both stay motions, which if successful would bring the cases to a close, arose out of a letter sent by Ted Thompson, assistant deputy justice minister, to Federal Chief Justice Julius Isaac complaining about the slow pace of proceedings in the Dueck/Oberlander/Tobiass case. Associate Chief Justice James Jerome was the presiding judge in that case as well as in the Nemsila case.

The letter — and Isaac's subsequent discussions with Jerome — constituted an interference in the independence of the judiciary, argued Barbara Jackman and Ronald Poulton, Nemsila's lawyers.

"A reasonable person ... would view the interventions by the assistant deputy attorney general as an attempt to influence the Federal Court in matters within the administrative and adjudicative domain of the court," their motion states.

The alleged impropriety took place last March when Thompson wrote to Isaac, complaining about the slow pace of proceedings in the case involving the three alleged war criminals. Thompson suggested that unless the tempo picked up, the cases would be referred to the Supreme Court.

Isaac subsequently discussed the issue with Jerome and later told Thompson that Jerome had not been aware of the pressing nature of the cases.

Lawyers for the three alleged war criminals were first to bring a motion for a stay, arguing judicial independence was at stake. Justice Department lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe is scheduled to resume his counter-arguments when court reconvenes this week.

ORT merges men's, women's groups

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — ORT Canada, the recent amalgamation of Women's Canadian ORT and Men's Canadian ORT, will hold its founding convention in Toronto this October, National executive director of ORT Canada, Diane Uslaner, said the amalgamation, which officially took place in January, had been in the works for two years.

"A gender neutral group made sense," she said, "because it confused the public to have two separate organizations. As well, we are on the verge of the 21st century and it just seemed redundant to have two organizations working towards the same goal. Toronto ORT and Montreal ORT are now also gender neutral."

Having two separate organizations was an anachronism of 50 years ago, when women did not work and had a lot of time for volunteer activities, Uslaner said.

"The reality now is that everyone works and most have little time for volunteerism. When they do have time, they should work together."

The changeover has been challenging but has gone well, she said.

Organization has drastically reduced expenses

"The donors appreciate it because in reality, the average Jew is inundated with requests for help and many of these requests double or even triple the same cause.

"As well, charities have to carefully manage their expenses, and having two organizations doubled the money we had to put out. We have now drastically reduced expenses by saving on such things as office space and staff."

Men and women in ORT chapters across Canada, from Halifax to Victoria, now meet together to plan fundraising events to support its system of worldwide technological schools.

"Our 800 schools operate in 27 countries, spread out over six continents. By working together, we have a more focused ORT raising money, in order to bring technical expertise into various and often farflung Jewish communities such as Bombay or Latin America. Isolated communities can also access ORTnet through the Internet. Users can talk with ORT students, study for their bar mitzvah, take some courses — any number of things," Uslaner said.

"We still do have certain events geared for men or women, but we are getting more into direct solicitation, which is the modern way of raising funds because it is easier and quicker. Direct or staged events are more costly and labor intensive, but they are still important because they build team spirit. By working on these events, volunteers bond with the organization and attract people who might otherwise not have heard of us. Both methods are an important part of fundraising."

The convention, which will take place at the Park Plaza Hotel from Oct. 18 to 20, will feature a talk by Ellen Isler, director general of World ORT Union in London, England, and a tribute to all past national presidents. For information, call ORT Canada 787-0339.

Barely 24 hours later

Barely 24 hours after the results of the Israeli elections had been announced, Syrian President Hafez al-Assad travelled to Cairo to discuss the aftermath with Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak.

In what can only be described as a truly surrealistic inversion of reality and myth, the kind for which Assad and all despots are famous, he complained to the media that "things are not going ahead in a positive direction." But as Warren Christopher has made plain, had Assad only wanted, he could have concluded a comprehensive agreement with the Labor-led government months before the election. That an agreement was not reached was proof that he did not want one.

From the Assads of the world such belligerent behavior is not surprising, although it is still disheartening. But when Jewish communal organizations are quick to condemn the newly elected prime minister we are both surprised and saddened. On June 5, The CJN received a press release whose very first sentence proclaims that "the victory of Benjamin Netanyahu ... represents a serious setback for peace." Even before Netanyahu has appointed a cabinet or announced a single governmental policy, the accusations fly. In the transition between governments is there any room for unity?

Not yet convinced

The Reform party concluded a four-day policy conference last week in Vancouver. It was designed to demonstrate Preston Manning's firm grip on a political party which is moderate, tolerant, widely-based, ready to govern and worthy of voter confidence. We are convinced about Manning but not yet about his party.

The party's platform stands essentially on three planks: drastic cuts in taxes while promising to quickly eliminate the deficit, stringent law and order, and a national unity policy based upon the radical decentralization of the federal system. Delegates to the conference displayed considerable passion for their policies, but few details. The issues and problems which Canada faces are complicated. Simplistic responses more closely resemble slogans than they do solutions. But more troubling than the simplistic platform is the fact that it still seems propped up by negativism, resentment and scapegoating. The Reform party must offer a vision of the country which is positive, which casts light rather than blame, which points at new directions rather than at scapegoats, which stands for something rather than against everything. The difference is not simply a matter of nuance or of emphasis. It is one of outlook and inheritance.

Rumor of a death

As of this writing, the reports are still unconfirmed. But last week, rumors emanating from Thailand claimed that 68-year-old Pol Pot, the leader of the Khmer Rouge, the communist guerrilla forces of Cambodia, had died from a malaria-related illness. In 1975, Pot's forces emerged victorious from a civil war, only to be overthrown three years later. Between 1975 and 1978, Pot's Khmer Rouge killed more than two million Cambodians. A mere 30 years after the fires were put out in Europe's crematoria, the fields of Cambodia ran red with the torrent of blood from another attempted genocide. And less than 20 years after that – Rwanda and Bosnia. If it is true that the sower of Cambodia's killing fields has died, then the metaphysics of the earth has been altered by one less measure of immeasurable evil. But this reduction yields no cosmic balance of justice or restored harmony to those sorrowful fields. Now, as then, the fields are a metaphor. The mind cannot grasp what was done to human beings, what was taken from human dignity and what pierced the human heart, there on the fields in Cambodia. The only significance of Pol Pot's death is, alas, his death.

Time to take a deep breath

This is a moment of wondering for Israel, and we must therefore all take a deep breath. Let us welcome the new Israeli prime minister and hope for the success of a new and very different government. Let us also remember and honor a great man and patriot, Shimon Peres.

Respect results of Israeli vote

This is not the first time we are seing an unholy aliance between right-wing nationalists and the religious. Historical precedents of this kind of coalition are not very promising. There is a price to be paid for each member's support and it is the secular Israeli public which will sign the cheques.

Israel voted and the results are to be respected. Our fervent hopes and good wishes are with the people of Israel.

Election results worry social democrat

Social democrats in Israel, of both religious and secular camps, are facing a rude awakening. Recent discussions with my relatives in Israel have brought to my attention some disturbing developments that may come to pass as a result of the new political dynamic in Israel, the overpowering control of religious fundamentalism.

As Canadian Jews and Quebecois, we well understand the fear of having our legitimate rights under attack. We must raise our voices in protest should the principles of human rights, integrity and general mentshlechkeit be eroded in Israel.

The tenets of social democracy find their roots in the Torah. As Jews we must see that religious authorities in Israel are held to both the letter and spirit of the Torah.

Judaism needs rediscovery, not new identity

Re "Seaching For a New Jewish Identity" by Ilan Gewurz (CJN, May 16).

The comment that "Today ... a generation that has never known any threat to its existence is being raised ... the external enemy is no longer a threat," is indeed a mistaken perception of reality. I am part of this so-called generation, and believe me, I have seen the works of groups and individuals who would have no trouble repeating what Hitler set out to do.

Do Jewish people want our culture to survive and if so for what reason? To discover the true essence of what it means to be Jewish, is to appreciate the various Judaisms that comprise this great culture. Understanding how they have developed and how they have survived is vital knowledge for every Jew.

In order to resolve to strengthen the very core of these Judaisms, we must concentrate on three important aspects: the Jewish people, the Jewish homeland and the spiritual quest towards God.

There is no search for a "new identity," but a rediscovery of what already exists.

Perspectives

The music my parents played

By BERNARD J. SHAPIRO

What one becomes as a person, what one is as an active adult, is, of course, the result of many considerations. There are considerations of genes — the genetic recipe which determines so much of what we are — physically and intellectually. There are the considerations of environment — whether of family, of history, of neighborhood, of language, of class or of culture. There are the considerations of value — ethical norms and/or religious commitments. Finally, and perhaps most importantly, there are the wonderfully unpredictable ways in which all of these considerations interact with each other to produce an adult not only with knowledge, not only with an occupation, not only with family and community ties, but also with unique characteristics of personality, of mind and of will.

Self-knowledge of one's own unique character is, of course, notoriously difficult to achieve, and I would not pretend to have done so myself. Clearly, the way in which I see and understand myself may not be the way in which others — whether those with whom I am intimately involved or those who have both the advantages and disadvantages of distance — perceive me. Nevertheless, I find it both interesting and stimulating to reflect on how it is that I have become myself, what is it that I learned from my life experience that continues to enrich and inform both what I am today and what I may become tomorrow.

One of my nieces, now a mature woman with a family of her own, once — as a young mother — remarked to me: "My God, I have become my mother!" This simply reflected the common human experience of on the one hand needing to separate ourselves from our parents and establish identities independent of them, and on the other hand recognizing how much, in the final analysis, we are, each of us, an inescapable product of what our parents are or were.

As I reflect on my own development, I want — more and more — to celebrate my parents, if only so as to recognize that the songs I sing are in so many ways a result of the music they played.

Their music was — in a way — primarily Jewish music. It is not that either of them was particularly observant in terms of Halachah. It was simply that both my father, a widowed immigrant from Wlodava who died almost 40 years ago, and my mother, a native Montrealer of immigrant parents who is, happily, alive and well to this day, understood themselves as Jews in a way that included moderate religious observance but was certainly not limited to it. Indeed, for them, being Jewish was not simply or even primarily a question of either the Ten Commandments and/or the 613 mitzvot. It was, perhaps even more importantly, a rather comprehensive culture thought by them to be "Jewish" in its nature, but which was, in fact, much more broadly based. It was a culture which assumed Judaism (including the need to be proud of it) and which included religious understandings and practices, but which also comprised a whole range of other commitments to what were understood (they were rarely actually stated) as appropriate attitudes toward family, toward education, toward social class and status, toward non-Jews and other Jews.

That is, in the home in which I grew up, the biblical covenant was never discussed. It was simply assumed that as Jews, we had no choice but to live — however imperfectly — both with the covenant and, in some never fully articulated sense, with the ambiguities — not to say contradictions — of Judaism as a religion of obedience as well as a regime of moral commitment. If Judaism in this sense was, as one commentator has suggested, a "hardship post," especially in 20th century Montreal where both my brother and I were expected by our parents to succeed, compromises were welcome. Indeed, they were assumed to be necessary. Judaism as a fully distinct, separate community was regarded as archaic, a relic — not dishonorable but nonetheless a relic — of an immigrant past with its own sentiments but with few really pleasant memories.

I grew up in comfortable if not opulent surroundings in Montreal and I was given the most fortunate of upbringings — security both financially and emotionally as well as the best (and often the most expensive) education of which my parents could conceive.

The heritage of Judaism was, for me, complex and ambiguous in the face of what was, again for me, a dawning modernity. It was not and is not entirely clear that modern Jewish culture and religious expression can be brought together with the talmudic tradition; and Maimonides' faith that the "new" learning will, in the final analysis, sustain the truths of the Torah remains to be demonstrated. I seemed, however, to "know" this without ever calling into question either my identity as a Jew or the conviction that such status was — in some communal sense — glorious even if it was obviously not much appreciated by either my Hampstead neighborhood or my schoolmates at Lower Canada College.

This ambiguity — almost schizophrenic — was, nevertheless, of a piece with the rest of my experience. Whether or not it is true that opposites attract, my parents were fascinatingly different from each other. They were both, it is true, absolutely reliable in a "pinch," and they were both devoted to their children, but as it turned out, in quite different ways. My father was older — the age of my friends' grandparents — more tolerant of human shortcomings, not frequently at home, extremely liberal with regard to the behavior patterns of teenagers, interested in my successes but not focused on them, and although apparently comfortable with himself as a Jew, this did not translate into any substantial formal religious observance. For him, Judaism was a combination of actual fact (he was born a Jew) and certain moral imperatives, not infrequently rather iconoclastic ones.

My mother was younger, decidedly judgmental on almost all issues, vitally concerned with religious observance in the home and community outside of it, focused almost entirely on both her own education (neither she nor my father had been able to finish high school) and, more particularly, on my education and that of my twin brother Harold. She was more than fully committed to the notion of family in the very extended sense, and her standards of behavior, especially for her two sons, were both high and incredibly clear. We were, after all, her career in more than the casual sense, and to us she directed both her time and her energy. My father was — for most of his life — a professional gambler. His associates were not those of either the country club or, indeed, the Jewish establishment, either financially, religious or intellectual. My mother was, I must admit, equally clever and certainly more intellectual, but she was also much more conventional.

What a rich symphony of character, personality and experience this provided! I did not have to leave home to recognize something of the range of choice available in adult behaviors. However, it also resulted in certain anomalies, which in retrospect seem as schizophrenic as our religious experience.

We — acknowledged Jews — lived in the suburb of Hampstead, a neighborhood in those days with very few Jewish families and an elementary school which did not admit Jewish children. Further, in terms of schooling, I attended (and enjoyed) Lower Canada College, in those days a bastion of the anglo- (and Anglican) Protestant establishment. The rest of the time, however, I lived almost entirely within the Montreal Jewish community, whether at Hebrew school or at the Shaar Hashomayim's Junior Congregation or in various youth groups, or with a warm and almost hyperactive family of aunts, uncles and cousins, including, apparently without distinction, those who were once, twice or three times removed.

Perhaps, it all had something to do with the wonderfully schizophrenic character of Montreal in that era. I understood — probably only vaguely — that Montreal was, in fact, a francophone community, but with the exception of my mother's housekeepers, I lived entirely in an anglophone environment. My parents often spoke Yiddish to each other, and they always did so with my grandmother. On the other hand, my brother and I were neither expected not encouraged to learn this language despite the richness of its history and its literature. Although as I have mentioned, neither of my parents had been able to complete high school, it was taken for granted that had they had the opportunity, they would have been stellar scholars, and that since I was to have the opportunity, I would actually be one. No one, to my knowledge, either wished or expected that I would pursue an academic career — business and/or the professions were the only futures discussed. Doing well at school and at university, however, was seen as both the symbol of the possibilities of life and the discipline we were expected to bring to all of our endeavors.

Finally, I was given to understand that anti-Semitism — although not necessarily its particularly virulent forms then being acted out in Nazi Germany — was an existential fact of life in a flawed world, perhaps an unconscious reflection of the teachings of the Zohar, but at the same time, I was assumed — with minimal actual evidence — to have both the talent and the inner strength to "make it" in "their" world.

The wonderful thing about my parents' music was the ground that it seems to cover — the range of style, of history, of imagination that it included. My father's songs were from the shtetl, leavened by the experiences of what for him actually was the goldene medina. My mother's first language was Yiddish, her second French, with English only a later third. Nevertheless, she brought me the possibilities of Beethoven and Verdi. That it all did not actually hang together in some coherent way seemed to me then and seems to me now to reflect to real messiness, the unpredicitability, the uncertainty, but the richness of life. I thought, indeed, that I had in some admittedly limited sense both seen and understood it all.

Then I met the woman who has been my wife for almost 40 years and I knew then, as I know now, that despite the undeserved but wonderful good fortune of my beginning, there was much more music still to come.

Exploring Bulawayo's Jewish community

By Viva Press

My sister Elissa and I arrived in Bulawayo, Zimbabwe, on a Monday afternoon. We travelled together with villagers and townsfolk on a crowded bus from Masvingo, a town about four hours away.

Bulawayo, Zimbabwe's second city, means in Ndebele, Place of Slaughter, in reference to fierce battles for succession that took place there in the late 19th century.

Both modern and colonial-era buildings line the wide and gridded city streets, offering a marked contrast to Harare, the capital, where new buildings have replaced the old.

After several hours of footing it in downtown Bulawayo, we decided to return to the youth hostel where we were staying. A resting place. Not as comfortable as our cousin's home in Harare, but very adequate, and equipped with decent beds and functional hot water showers.

The sun was setting, the sky was brilliant with color and the streets were filling up with the locals who had just finished another day's work. And it was also almost six o'clock.

The Bulawayo Hebrew Congregation Synagogue was only five blocks from the hostel. Would it be open on a Monday evening? We walked along Robert Mugabe Way to Eighth Avenue and then down Jason Moyo Street to the corner of Third Avenue.

And then we saw it — a soft blue building on the North East corner of Third and Moyo.

We were just in time for Minchah. But the two guards in front of the shul wouldn't let us in. These impressive officials remained unmoved by our petitioning until one of the congregants arrived. When we introduced ourselves, he was more than happy to welcome us into the shul. And gratified that were there.

It's a good thing Elissa and I are fairly fluent in Hebrew and could follow the rattling pace at which the service progressed. The rabbi wasn't present, and the 14 of us whizzed through Minchah, the davening led by an elderly congregant whose name we never did find out. But we know he is 97 years old.

After the service, my sister and I became the focus of attention. There was much excitement when the 12 congregants found out that we were from Canada. Barrages of questions followed in quick succession. Did we know their friends and family in Toronto, in Winnipeg, in Montreal, in Vancouver? Elissa recognized a few family names, and I knew a couple as well. But in all the flurry of responding to the strings of names thrown at us, we realized afterwards that we had not caught any of the congregants' names.

Bulawayo once boasted more than 10,000 Jews. Now only 200 Jews remain. The huge Bulawayo Synagogue has a balcony that encircles the main sanctuary with its centre bimah and 52 aisles. And this Orthodox shul, designed to seat more than 1,000 people, serves as a reminder of the flourishing and populous Jewish community who lived in this southern African city until the early 60s.

Underneath a blue wall clock with gold colored Hebrew letters taking the place of numbers is a bookcase filled with Hebrew texts that include the siddurim we used for Minchah, siddurim from the Artscroll Editions used for all services.

At the front of the Sanctuary, the ark is covered with a conventional dark red velvet curtain.

The shul reminded me of the one I had visited in Rhodes, Greece, in the summer of 1994. Both shuls, like many others in Europe and southern Africa, serve as reminders of the large communities who once worshipped there.

Although the community has dwindled appreciably, the Bulawayo Hebrew Congregation still has a minyan every day, seven days a week.

And surprisingly, the Hebrew day school in Bulawayo still exists. This school, like its counterpart in Harare, now has a largely non-Jewish student body. Together with the Jewish students, who are in a minority, all the students at the Bulawayo Hebrew Day School learn Hebrew. In the Harare school, only the Jewish students learn Hebrew. But at both schools, in Bulawayo and in Harare, all the students, Jewish and non-Jewish, get instruction in Jewish studies.

Throw it out! For what?

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

The signs are everywhere, from high school to university to everyday life. Everything that's old (whatever that means) is deemed obsolete. Except for antiques, things are judged not for their usefulness but by their age. That wouldn't be so bad — after all, that's what fuels our economy, which thrives on obsolescence. The real problem is that this phenomenon affects relationships as well. The soaring divorce rate is the prime example of this development, as is the fact that employment is increasingly no longer full time and bonds of loyal service are thrown on the ashheap of obsolescence, like things.

Or look at our educational enterprise. One of the least popular subjects, which only a few years ago reigned first in interest, is history. Students shy away from it today because it has no apparent pragmatic value. What can you do with history?

When I grew up, it was a given that learning ancient history and Latin were part of a person's education: the one because it helped us to understand who we were and the other because it helped us to understand the language we spoke. No more. Today not even the simplest essentials of Latin are understood. Ask someone what the singular of alumni is or the plural of alumna and don't be shocked at the answer.

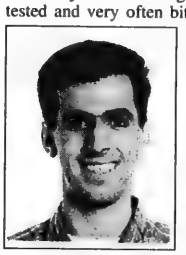
The anti-classical trend shows itself in more important areas than the singular or plural of words. History of any and all kinds is disappearing from our schools. Why learn something about centuries long gone when it is so tough to absorb all the material one needs for getting by today?

If all this is happening around us, is it a surprise that we Jews too are affected by it, and with a vengeance at that? Why study the Jewish past when anyone's past is "useless" and when being educated in the old-fashioned sense makes no sense at all to a pragmatic generation?

No one is as deeply affected by these trends as is the Jewish community, both in the Diaspora and in Israel. There, at least, the very land reminds people of ages gone by, but even there, archeology (which yesterday was a favorite subject of Israelis) has lost its shine amongst the majority of people. The Bible itself — the very textbook of Israel — is becoming a closed book. An Israeli journalist told me the other day that ignorance was spreading at such a pace that a significant portion of the population, all raised in Israeli schools and all having studied biblical texts, were no longer able to mention the five books of the Torah or recite two of the Ten Commandments.

Where does that leave us who are struggling to maintain our Jewishness in the Diaspora? Those who say that they don't care and have more "important" things to do are heading straight into Jewish oblivion and into the arms of total assimilation. So it is up to the rest of us to become more literate, more interested, more caring about our heritage, because without our heritage we Jews are nothing and might as well forget about who we are and why we still cling to some vestiges of tradition.

Comparing the vote in Israel and Quebec



By Eliezer Brodt

For the Montreal Jewish community, it felt, as Yogi Berra once put it, like deja vu all over again — a hotly contested and very often bitter political campaign drawing to a close with analysts unable to predict the outcome; entire families spending their evening glued to the TV newscasts anxiously awaiting the results; preliminary reports indicating that one side was leading, only to have those reports reversed as the night wore on; and finally, a winner being crowned by a razor-thin majority of less than one percentage point.

Indeed, many analogies can be drawn between the just-completed Israeli elections and last year's Quebec referendum. Personally, such a comparison takes me back to a sunny Friday afternoon in late October 1995, when most of my classmates and I shoved our casebooks aside and merrily raced down Peel Street to join over 100,000 fellow Canadians in a rally for national unity. Never before had I felt so proudly patriotic at being a Canadian as I did that afternoon. The crowd sang, chanted and waved flags in an unbridled expression of love for Canada and Quebec. Among the many national flags I saw that day, one particularly caught my attention: a blue and white Magen David standing inconspicuously among a sea of Maple Leafs and Fleurs-de-Lis. Cute.

Unfortunately, the next time I saw an Israeli flag on the corner of Peel and Rene-Levesque the occasion was far different. A mere eight days after that rally and five days after the agonizingly close referendum vote, Montreal Jews had to deal with another crisis: Yitzhak Rabin's murder by a fellow Jew. That night after Shabbat, about 300 people (mostly university students) gathered at the same intersection in a sombre, gut-wrenching vigil outside the Israeli Consulate. Several students draped Israeli flags around their backs but were too numb from grief to wave them. As a local rabbi spoke about the need for Jewish unity and reconciliation, the irony hit me. Last week we were joyously and boisterously rallying for Canadian unity. This week we were standing at the very same corner, tearfully and quietly praying for Jewish unity.

Roller-coaster of emotions

For the Jews in our city who favored Benjamin Netanyahu and Likud's peace policies over those of Shimon Peres and Labor, watching last week's electoral results unfold produced a roller-coaster of emotions that paralleled those felt on Referendum night. The early exit polls placing the Yes side and Peres in the lead were greeted with dismay and appreciation. This was gradually replaced with guarded optimism as the No votes and Netanyahu slowly closed the gap and then took the lead. Finally, a crescendo of relief and euphoria was felt as the final results were announced. Of course, for those who were hoping to see Peres re-elected the roller-coaster was reversed — happiness slowly gave way to despondency.

And therein lies a critical difference between the two events. While our community was almost unanimously united in our support for federalism during the referendum, we seemed quite divided when it came to the Israeli elections, just as Israeli society itself was. However, perhaps this rift is not nearly as wide as the journalists and pundits would have us believe. Regardless of where we may fall on the political spectrum, Israeli and Montreal Jews all long for Israel to enjoy real peace coupled with real security. We only disagree on the best path to travel for Israel to reach that goal.

Sensing the need to unite the country, Prime Minister-elect Netanyahu declared in his victory speech: "I call on all the public in Israel, those who voted for me and those who didn't, and I say to you, I plan to be the prime minister of everyone without any exception." Montreal Jewry hopes he succeeds and yearns for our local political leaders to adopt the same credo.

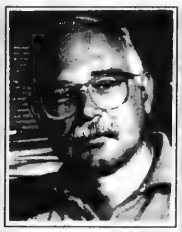
Goldhagen's study is remarkable but flawed



By Sheldon Kirshner

Surprisingly little attention has been paid to the perpetrators in Holocaust literature. Several years ago, the void was partially filled by Christopher Browning in Ordinary Men, and by Ernst Klee, Willi Dressner and Volker Riess in Those Were The Days. But with the publication of Daniel Jonah Goldhagen's Hitler's Willing Executioners (Random House, $39.95), this neglected topic is invested with new, sombre meaning.

Quite simply, Goldhagen's book — a refined and expanded spinoff of his PhD thesis — is a remarkable, though flawed, achievement. It may well change our understanding of the role ordinary Germans played in the implementation of the Holocaust and of the nature of anti-Semitism in Germany.

Until now, countless historians have told us that such factors as indifference, coercion, blind obedience, social and psychological pressures and occupational ambition accounted for the willingness of Germans to brutalize and murder Jews.

But to Goldhagen, a Harvard professor, conventional explanations are insufficient, as they ignore, deny or minimize the importance of the perpetrators' moral values and conception of their Jewish victims.

"My explanation — which is new to the scholarly literature on the perpetrators — is that the perpetrators, 'ordinary Germans,' were animated by ... a particular type of anti-Semitism that led them to conclude that the Jews ought to die," writes Goldhagen.

Rejecting previous theories, Goldhagen claims that the vast majority of Germans shared Hitler's malevolent view of the Jews. Furthermore, he argues, German society was thoroughly permeated with anti-Semitism. "Essentially, in Germany during the Nazi period, anti-Semitism was shouted from the rooftops."

Nazi anti-Semitism, stoked to a fever pitch by the state, was the culmination of centuries of demonization of the Jew as an alien body. Like the historian Paul Lawrence Rose (Revolutionary Anti-Semitism in Germany From Kant to Wagner), Goldhagen observes that even 19th century German liberals who were in favor of Jewish emancipation were infected by anti-Semitic attitudes.

Unlike incorrigible anti-Semites, they were of the opinion that Jews could be reformed, provided they renounced Judaism completely, integrated themselves fully into German society and, in effect, disappeared. As a result of this pressure, a significant number of culturally prominent Jews converted to Christianity.

The onset of racial anti-Semitism, which defined Jews as a nation rather than as a religious community, rendered conversion almost irrelevant. Race meant not only that Jews could never become Germans. It also condemned Jews as permanent enemies of the German people. By this logic, Jews had to be eliminated, root and branch, from German society. According to Goldhagen, this sentiment was "extremely widespread" as the 20th century dawned.

But if this is true, why were non-converted Jews able to achieve such prominence in the arts and sciences and in politics? And why was the mixed marriage rate so high? Goldhagen fails to answer these questions satisfactorily. However, he does point out, correctly, that German Jews continued to suffer from systemic disabilities and slights, and that their social position remained precarious right up to World War I.

Goldhagen states that virtually every major institution and group in the Weimar Republic, from universities and the military to professional associations and political parties, was contaminated by anti-Semitism. And while this assertion contains elements of the truth, Goldhagen offers no conclusive proof that "nearly every political group in the country shunned the Jews."

Neither is Goldhagen on firm ground when he states that the Nazis' eliminationist program was supported by every class in German society, not just the so-called "rabble." True, even anti-Nazi clergymen and members of the ineffectual resistance movement wallowed in the swamp of anti-Semitism, as Goldhagen shows. But does this mean that they sought to drive the Jews out of Germany?

Goldhagen is right when he reminds us that only once — during the Rosenstrasse affair — was there a big public protest by Germans on behalf of Jews. Yet I am far from certain that, as he maintains, the deportations of German Jews "were, with some exceptions, greatly popular among the populace." He cites but one example, glibly assuming that universal conclusions can be drawn from a single, albeit powerful, incident.

Goldhagen does not ignore those Germans who, at risk to their own lives, helped Jews by hiding them. But he quickly adds that they were not representative of the larger German population.

Tracing the evolution of Nazi Germany's anti-Semitic policy, Goldhagen charts its development from an emphasis on isolating the Jews and encouraging them to emigrate to a devilish calculation that a final solution to the "Jewish problem" lay in genocide.

Germany's genocidal campaign against Jews began with the invasion of the Soviet Union in June 1941. The task was initially assigned to mobile killing units, or Einsatzgruppen. The second phase of the Nazis' murderous program was launched a year later with the building of death camps in Poland, the demographic centre of European Jewry.

The camps, ranging from Auschwitz to Sobibor, were primarily guarded by the Order Police, many of whose recruits had no special affiliation with Hitlerian institutions like the Nazi party or the SS. Apart from fulfilling these duties, the Order Police engaged in anti-partisan warfare, fought alongside the Wehrmacht and participated in the mass killing of Jews.

As Goldhagen explains in his meticulous analysis, the Order Police, with a membership of 19,000, was not strictly a Nazi institution. Due to the selection process, it was composed mainly of older family men, of reservists who generally were more personally independent and less Nazified than the average German policeman or soldier. And yet, they easily became putty in the Nazis' hands, or as Goldhagen puts it, "genocidal executioners," who took part in the slaughter of tens of thousands of Jews in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

Relying on primary documents gathered in Germany, Goldhagen describes the crimes of the Order Police in chilling detail, going far beyond the research conducted by Christopher Browning in Ordinary Men, the landmark study of one of its units, battalion 101.

In next week's column, I will deal with this subject and related subjects as I conclude my review of Goldhagen's troubling tome.

Seniors, students knit closer ties

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Every other Monday afternoon, a group of seniors and students take over the staff room at Pleasant Public School in North York.

The seniors, volunteers from the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, are teaching a Grade 4/5 class how to knit. The two groups sit together knitting needles in hand schmoozing as they knit. They've been meeting since October.

The program, called Knitting Generations Together, is sponsored by United Generations Ontario, an organization dedicated to building positive intergenerational relationships.

"I love working with the children. They're so enthusiastic. It makes me feel good," says Anne Padber. "It's good for us and it's good for them."

"I enjoy spending time with seniors," says Ariel Lipovetzky, a Grade 4 student. "I'm always jumping around and this [knitting] makes me relax."

According to teacher Patti Durkee, the knitting sessions are calming for the students, who are relaxed and open with the seniors. "I just sit back and watch the interaction.

"During a six week hiatus, the children missed the knitting sessions with the seniors," she says. "They're very happy to have the seniors back today."

The volunteers have also been meeting with students at Rockford Road Public School, Louis Honore Frechette School in Thornhill and Bialik Hebrew Day School.

They met with Bialik students to compare childhood experience of the two generations, says Rose Cherry, chair of the centre's intergenerational committee.

The students were surprised the seniors grew up in sparse living conditions like homes with one bathroom and phones with party lines, Cherry notes. "You didn't have a room for yourself. We slept three in a bed."

Satisfying work

The intergenerational work is very satisfying, she says. "Some of the children don't have grandparents ... I get enjoyment from helping."

Volunteer Ruth Weiser finds the relationship with the children very rewarding, she says. "I don't have any children or grandchildren. I get to be a bubbie."

Judi Egelnick, intergenerational and community outreach liaison at Bernard Betel has been coordinating the centre's intergenerational programs for the last three years. She is concerned about the lack of funding for intergenerational programming, she says.

"It's in danger. Too bad. They have done unbelievable programs. You have to give them [the seniors] credit for their commitment. They love the kids. They come in the worst slush. Nothing deters them."

Canadian women become Reconstructionist rabbis

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in suburban Philadelphia has graduated its first two Canadian women.

Elizabeth Bolton of Montreal and Sarra Levine of Toronto were among 13 graduates to receive the title of rabbi and a master's degree in Hebrew letters at the college's graduation ceremonies last Sunday.

The 39-year-old Rabbi Bolton, who was a well-known social activist and cantor in Toronto before heading to rabbinical school, will become the founding director of the college's new Centre for Jewish Creativity. The post was created especially for her and she will start the job this fall.

Rabbi Elizabeth Bolton

Born in Montreal, she graduated from Concordia University and performed opera with the Studio de Musique Ancienne de Montréal, the Tudor Singers and the Opéra de Montréal.

In Toronto, she served as cantor at Temple Emanu-El and helped create Kol Nashim, an all-female cantorial group, as well as the Chai Project, which promotes awareness of AIDS in the Jewish community. She helped lead High Holy Day services over the past few years at Congregation Darchei Noam.

Both the CBC and TVOntario have produced documentaries on her work as a singer, cantor, teacher and Jewish feminist.

The Centre for Jewish Creativity will focus on the creative aspects of Judaism, including Jewish civilization, art, drama and music. It will promote and develop skills in Jewish story-telling, crafts, writing and the fine arts.

Rabbi Bolton will also serve two small congregations part time, one in New Jersey and the other in Vermont.

She told The CJN she would "dearly love" to return to Canada some day.

Rabbi Levine, 32, a Toronto native, is a Bialik and CHAT graduate and earned a BA in religious studies from York University in 1986. She was active in Congregation Beit Haminyan and Hashomer Hatzair.

She became a peace activist and marched across the United States in the Great Peace March of 1986.

Rabbi Levine told The CJN she will continue her studies as a doctoral student in Talmud at New York University, and plans to open what she calls the world's first feminist yeshivah, Bat Kol, in Jerusalem in the summer of 1997.

Baumel pushes for MiAs' release

captives still being held in the Bekaa Valley. Her son was photographed (it's blurry and indistinct) in Damascus the day after his capture by PLO forces.

In December 1993, in what was supposed to be a gesture of goodwill, Yasser Arafat handed over half her son's military dogtags and promised more information two weeks later. No further evidence from the Palestinian leader was forthcoming, even though Baumel believes the PLO has "historic information" about her son's fate.

And there has been "extensive intelligence information" — she won't be more specific — that her son is still alive.

Baumel speaks for five of the families of the MiAs. Along with her son, they are the families of Zvi Feldman, Yehuda Katz, Joseph Fink and Rachamim Alshichi. Ron Arad's family carries on their own campaign for his release. Feldman, Katz and Baumel became MiAs in 1982, the others in two separate incidents in 1986.

Feldman, Katz and Baumel were captured by the PLO, who subsequently lost control over them to pro-Syrian forces. The three other Israeli MiAs are believed to be held by Hezbollah.

While critical of Arafat, Miriam Baumel is also angry at the Israeli government, which in the last few years has released thousands of Palestinian prisoners without receiving any information on the MiAs in return.

Baumel has taken her son's cause around the world, trying to enlist people of goodwill in pushing for his release.

Baumel said she's "indignant" at the lack of effort from Diaspora Jewish communities to help her cause. Canadian Jews, for instance, could press the government, which provides aid to the Palestinians, to seek more information from Arafat about her son and the others.

In Israel, she's heartened by the electoral success of former Soviet Refusenik Natan Sharansky, whose Israel b'Aliyah party garnered seven Knesset seats.

The former dissident told her that even while he was being held in Soviet prisons, "he wasn't worried because he knew the entire world was trying to get him out."

Why aren't there similar efforts for the MiAs, she asked.

In the meantime, she's returning to Israel after her visit to North America and will press the new government to make the release of her son and the other prisoners a precondition for peace.

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Amid the Torah portions this month, we read of the death of Miriam. The verse is concise: "The whole Israelite community arrived ... and the people settled at Kadesh. It was here that Miriam died and here that she was buried."

After the major contributions and dedication of this woman, the end of her life seems to be conveyed in a cold fashion, almost as an afterthought of little significance. Yet by carefully looking at the placement of this verse within the context of the larger chapters, one sees how, even in her death, Miriam blazed new frontiers for the nation to follow.

The chapter immediately preceding Miriam's death gives the rules of the red heifer. This unique animal was rare and once found, was specifically preserved for one ritual. The law dictated that the red heifer was to be taken as a sacrifice and its ashes mixed with water. This prepared water was then used to ritually purify anyone who had come in contact with a corpse.

The Torah is very specific about the necessity for this cleansing: "[Anyone] who fails to be purified shall be cut off from the community." In other words, if a someone comes in contact with a corpse, that person will remain an outcast forever, unless this specific sacrificial ritual is performed.

Immediately after these laws are explained, the Torah tells of the death of Miriam. She is, therefore, the first person whose death can be purified by the sacrifice of the red heifer. Any death previous to hers would have plunged the nation into ritual uncleanliness and resulted in a nation of outcasts.

It is Miriam's death that opens the door for the nation to reconsecrate itself through the red heifer. In fact, the Torah states that the nation "settled at Kadesh." Although Kadesh is the name of a place, it is also the Hebrew word for "holy." The Torah is stating that through the ritual cleansing performed for the first time after Miriam's death, the nation is now able to gain a status of holiness that it could not previously attain.

Water weaves itself through Miriam's life from the first time we see her until her death. She safeguards Moses at the Nile; she leads the women in hymns at the shores of the Red Sea; because of her, a well accompanies the nation through the desert. Even in her death, Miriam provides the opportunity for Israel to sanctify itself and once again become holy. Without the prepared water, the nation would live as outcasts.

If one were to eulogize Miriam, a possible tribute would be to recognize this woman as a model for all Jewish people. Standing at the Nile, she teaches the importance of family. Singing at the Red Sea, she teaches the need to establish a relationship with God. Through Miriam's Well, she teaches the importance of community. When Israel is able to consecrate itself after her death, Miriam sends us her final message: No Jew should be an outcast.

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Dr. Neil Rosenstein of New Jersey has been researching his roots ever since his childhood in South Africa. Born in Cape Town in 1944, he studied medicine there and interned in Israel, but despite the rigors of medical school he never abandoned his family tree research for long. A surgeon, he jokingly describes his medical practice as a hobby that interferes with his genealogy, and compares the genealogical obsession to a malarial fever "that may disappear temporarily but never goes away completely."

The author of a shelf of books relating to rabbinic roots and Jewish genealogy, Rosenstein's magnum opus is The Unbroken Chain. First published as a single volume in 1976, the study was extensively reworked and republished in 1990 in two large volumes of about 1,350 pages, with perhaps four times the content of the original.

The Unbroken Chain traces the lineages of many distinguished rabbis, talmudists and prominent Jewish personalities, and shows how their families are linked. Through meticulous research, Rosenstein connects Karl Marx, Helena Rubinstein, Martin Buber, Moses Montefiore, Moses and Felix Mendelssohn and other accomplished Jews. Key branches of the same family tree involve the famous Katzenellenbogen, Auerbach and Landau rabbinical lines.

The figure at the top of the pyramid is Rabbi Meir Katzenellenbogen of Padua (1482-1565), otherwise known as the MaHaRam of Padua, whose descendants gave rise to the Ger, Bobov, Horowitz and other leading chassidic dynasties of 18th-century Europe. Not too surprisingly, there are strong hints of royalty in the family as well. Rabbi Meir's grandson, Saul Wahl Katzenellenbogen, entered Polish folklore in medieval times by allegedly becoming "king for a day" during an inexplicable interregnum of seven months between Polish kings.

Rosenstein is himself connected to the "unbroken chain," since his grandfather was a Katzenellenbogen. This does not put him into exclusive company, however, since he estimates that as many as half a million Jews alive today may claim descendancy from the Padua Rav. Rokeach, Horowitz-Margareten and Rothschild are other prominent names on the same tree.

Rosenstein's other works include Latter Day Leaders, Sages and Scholars (Zichron Le-Acharonim in Hebrew), a compendium of more than 5,500 Jewish notables born in various localities between the late 18th and the early 20th centuries. With Rabbi C.U. Lipschitz, he co-authored The Feast and the Fast (1984), a translation from the Hebrew of portions of the dramatic biography of Rav Yom Tov Lipman Heller, a 17th-century Torah giant, complete with a genealogical appendix and index of more than 1,330 related families. In 1989 he and Charles B. Berstein wrote From King David to Baron David, a study of a Rothschild genealogy.

While legends of a descent from King David or Rashi, the medieval Torah commentator, persist in many Jewish families, such undocumented stories are usually problematic and best taken as legend. Rashi's family tree has long been the focus of a scholarly debate in which Rosenstein, not surprisingly, has participated.

Finding an ancestral connection to a noted rabbi is one way that Ashkenazi researchers may sidestep the "brick wall" of about 1800, roughly speaking, before which Jewish communities in Russia, Lithuania, Galicia, Prussian Poland and other regions were not obliged to keep civil records.

Besides the books mentioned above, your rabbinical ancestor may be found in Otzar Harabanim, by R. Nathan Zvi Friedman, a biographical encyclopedia listing some 20,000 rabbis from the year 970 to 1970. Or try Meorei Galicia, by R. Meir Wunder, an encyclopedia of Galician rabbis and scholars. Easily accessible, the Encyclopedia Judaica also provides extensive rabbinical genealogies, including one for the Besht or Baal Shem Tov.

In centuries past, books written by rabbis often contained a page-long forward or approbation (Haskamah in Hebrew) outlining an illustrious lineage. A gentleman who claims descent from Rabbi Joseph Caro (Shulchan Aruch) recently showed me such a page from an antiquated book, outlining his yichus or lineage. Researchers often utilize pinkassim (Jewish communal record-books) and rabbinic responsa (letters) as well.

Interpreting such materials is not for beginners. The task requires a knowledge of written Hebrew and the ability to decipher Rashi script (a combination of Hebrew and Aramaic textual characters) and a host of arcane Hebrew acronyms.

But for the dedicated researcher who finds a rabbinical route around the brick wall of 1800, no linguistic or cultural barrier of this kind is apt to stand in the way for very long.

Jewish Life

Shabbat's a time to savor for family and friends

By CAROL SEIDMAN

As a Jewish woman, as a very busy Jewish woman, nothing makes more sense in my week than Shabbat is a 25-hour period of rest, spirituality and family time where our schedules are different from the rest of the week.

Guest Voices

Since most of my friends and colleagues do not know about Shabbat, I like to begin with a description of the most expensive room in a good Japanese hotel. These are the rooms without telephones, voicemail, TVs, faxes or e-mail. This comparison usually gets their attention and occasionally their interest, but it is only a small part of the big picture.

To truly understand Shabbat, one has to take the plunge and experience it. Fifteen years ago, at the age of 30, I took a leap of faith and never looked back. Luckily for me, I had a husband who took the journey with me, who feels as blessed as I do when we reflect on our transformative decision.

As life gets faster, as time seems more and more of a scarcity, I savor and need Shabbat more and more.

There is an indescribable feeling of safety and peace when I pull my car into the garage on Friday afternoon and watch the door go down. This feeling is intensified if it is snowing heavily or it has been an overly strenuous day.

My family is as anxious for Shabbat as I am. I know my daughter is safely at home. I need not worry about my 17-year-old son on the road or my husband Peter or myself having to fight the elements — at least for the next 25 hours.

Joy is knowing my children and husband will be at the table for Friday night supper and Saturday lunch. There are no meetings to rush away to, no airplane to catch or meet, no telephone calls, computer attractions or jobs which must be attended to. It is just the four of us ... for as long as we want. Peter doesn't wear a tie or a watch on Friday night as his way of marking the arrival of Shabbat.

I love inviting guests for a Shabbat meal, but I limit having guests to either Friday night or Saturday lunch, as the four of us need our privacy, to just be together.

Having guests is extra work, but with four family members pitching in with the shopping, cooking and cleaning, entertaining guests is not only easier but more enjoyable. Shabbat guests, especially those who are Sabbath observant, are also in a frame of mind where time is different. We, as a group, enjoy the feeling of peace which has arrived with the lighting of the Friday night candles. We do not have the workday habit of getting through tasks on a list which necessitates the eat and run syndrome.

Not having attended Hebrew school as children, Peter and I often depend on others to provide the Torah discussions at our table. Our children or guests have not only been willing teachers of the weekly parshah, but have taught us to sing Shabbat and holiday songs and to bench (recite the Grace after the meal).

I wish I knew Hebrew and had been given a formal Jewish education. Trying to learn as an adult, I have found, is not only full of limitations because of my other responsibilities, but it is hard to get focused after a long day at work.

Late on Shabbat afternoons, usually after a long nap, I attend a women's shiur (lecture) on the parshah of the week, given at our shul. This is my best time to learn, reflect and discuss, as I am usually well rested and free to absorb the depth and beauty of the text.

Have time to read, attend a class

Learning Torah once a week is not enough. I still feel frustrated at my lack of knowledge and thirst to know more. At least on Shabbat I have time to read, attend a class and have discussions with family and friends.

How did I spend Saturdays 15 years ago? Would I trade 25 hours of mental health and spirituality, family time and time with friends for shopping at Yorkdale and ordering in takeout? Would I trade the profane for the holy? I thank G-d that we are blessed with the gift of Shabbat for ourselves and for our children. I feel my choice 15 years ago has been the right decision, not only for Peter and me, but also for our children. Recently I had a conversation with my son who was dreaming out loud about going out of town to university. Despite his concerns about dorm life, he could never imagine not keeping the Shabbat.

I often wonder how this most important day, which we are given as a commandment to remember and guard, is ignored by the rest of our families. I read once that we have been given keys to a kingdom and a chance to be royal for 25 hours a week. Instead of relishing the nobility of it all, most of us throw it away or never know it is there to savor.

The four of us are on our own in our extended families when it comes to Sabbath observance. Two sets of grandparents, seven aunts and uncles and 10 cousins, and none are shomer Shabbat. Sadly this was not true when the children's great-grandparents were alive. In my brother's family there is no Yiddishkeit, as his wife is Cree and so are his two children.

I am struck by the irony that in my family, the pain of being different falls on the four of us for our traditional ways. Being an observant Jew is more foreign in my family than being Cree. So we have created a new family — the friends and neighbors who walk with us to shul, eat at our table for yom tov and Shabbat and share our ideals and aspirations for a balanced life. We get a taste of the world to come every week with the arrival of the Sabbath.

When the Sabbath is over, we end as we begin, with fire from a special candle and a glass of wine for havdalah. The havdalah service, which marks the departure of Shabbat on Saturday night and literally means separation, includes the smelling of fragrant spices. We use cloves, cinnamon and nutmeg. Aromatherapy, so much in vogue with the new agers, is also thousands of years old and was practised in ancient Egypt and Rome for its medicinal purposes. The power of scent to heal body, mind and spirit, to relieve stress and enhance moods seems the perfect ritual and symbol to fill one's nostrils as a last act of Shabbat. We smell the fragrant spices and hold the sweetness in our memories until the Sabbath comes again.

I am always a little sad as the spicebox goes around my dining room table and is passed from one of us to another. I know it will be six days until the Sabbath is back. It was Helen Keller who said, "Smell is a potent wizard that transports us across thousands of miles and all the years we have lived."

When in our busy lives do we have time to think about smell? Is it any wonder that we are reminded to take time to smell the roses? Rather than checking into an expensive hotel room half way across the world, I create a time bubble for all four of us once a week, complete with fresh flowers, delicious food and guests. There is deep pleasure in knowing the restorative comfort and power of Shabbat and the fact that there is another one coming after this one. As Jewish women, as busy Jewish women, we have been given Shabbat to embrace as our birthright.

Likud may push ahead with peace: Blitzer

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Although the recent Israeli election "did in the short term achieve the short-term gains of the Palestinian terrorists who sought to destroy the peace process," their assumption that a Likud-led government would not continue the peace process may prove to be wrong, said Wolf Blitzer recently.

The CNN senior White House correspondent was one of two keynote speakers along with Nobel laureate John Polanyi, at a recent gala dinner held at the Sheraton Centre to honor the Weizmann Institute of Science. Four hundred people attended the dinner, which was emceed by actor Al Waxman.

Blitzer, a former Washington correspondent for the Jerusalem Post, has known Netanyahu for over 20 years. The prime minister-elect is "young, sophisticated and intelligent," he said. "He won't squander this opportunity. At least I don't believe he will."

For Blitzer, the political climate in Israel is similar to that following the 1977 election of then prime minister Menachem Begin. "I remember the doom and gloom scenario [when] many felt the old-time leader of Herut would never give up land for peace," he said.

Although Israel agreed to give up all of Sinai under Begin's leadership, Blitzer remembers hearing Begin say earlier in his term as prime minister, when Blitzer himself was reporting from the Middle East, that Israel would never give up the northern Sinai town of Yamit and that in fact he intended to retire there one day.

"In the heat of opposition rhetoric, political leaders say things ... upon taking office, they wind up doing things they may not have wanted to do earlier.

"I don't know if Benjamin Netanyahu will be able to take [the] kinds of tough decisions that probably will be necessary to continue the peace process. My gut tells me he will desperately want to prove his critics were wrong when they predicted that a Likud victory would poison Israel's relationships with its Arab neighbors, with the United States and with the rest of the world...

Wolf Blitzer

"It's not going to be easy. He'll have to move slowly. He'll have to educate his own party and his own supporters."

There is already speculation in Washington, Blitzer said, that Netanyahu "might be in a better position to take the kind of risks for peace that the Labor party could not have taken."

Both Blitzer, who first toured the Weizmann on an Israel visit in 1961 (the year of his bar mitzvah), and Polanyi, an occasional visitor to Weizmann, lauded the importance of the Rehovot institution's scientific research.

The dinner raised over $2 million in pledges for Weizmann's Canada Fund for Biomedical Research. The fund will further development of diagnostic tests, new drugs and knowledge of diseases such as cancer, diabetes, Alzheimer's disease, multiple sclerosis and arthritis.

Weizmann is very involved in international projects and has a long history of collaboration with Canada, noted Prof. Ruth Arnon, vice-president, international scientific relations for the institute.

Polanyi, who was awarded a Nobel Prize in Chemistry in 1988, stressed the importance of international cooperation among scientists for the betterment of all humanity.

He also emphasized the importance of research for its own sake. "It's folly to use as one's guide the criterion of utility ... Useful outcomes are best identified after the making of discoveries."

Correction

In our May 30 issue, the article March of the Living stirs intense emotions incorrectly identified Roman Ziegler as Norman Ziegler.

As well, Ziegler's comments regarding Polish anti-Semitism were misquoted, and were originally a quote from former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir.

We apologize for any inconveniences these errors may have caused.

Federation opens Israeli Centre at BJC

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It has an imposing name, no paid staff and a small office, but there are high hopes that it will bring 30,000 Israelis in Toronto closer to the general Jewish community.

The Israeli Community Centre was officially opened June 9 at the Bathurst Jewish Centre, under auspices of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

In the morning, trained volunteers who speak Hebrew and other languages will answer calls to 635-2677 about what services are available from Federation agencies.

"There is quite a lot of ignorance in the Israeli community about this," said David Gerichter, president of Golan Alarms, one of the organizers. "We hope this centre will help bridge the distance between Israelis and the [rest of the] community."

The 10 telephone volunteers will be able to call on the help of about 30 other volunteers, who include doctors, lawyers, accountants and businesspeople, to answer queries free of charge.

Visiting Israelis and their Toronto hosts will also be able to get useful information about events of interest to Israelis.

One of the centre's services is a registry of all Israeli professionals and tradespeople in Toronto. The fee to join this is $25 to cover the cost of a computer.

"Most Israelis are surprised to learn what kind of things they can get help on," said Gerichter. "I am sure it would be the same if a Canadian went to Israel and didn't know where to begin."

Up to now, he said, some Israelis have become discouraged at what they see as "bureaucratic blocks" to getting service.

The centre is not intended to compete with Federation agencies, but will be an additonal resource.

Gerichter said many Israelis have an "internal conflict" about whether to stay in Canada or go back to Israel and the centre is in no way interested in attracting other Israelis to emigrate. "We are in no way a growth industry."

But for those Israelis who have decided to stay in Canada, it makes sense to bring them closer to the mature, organized Jewish community, he said.

Gerichter, 48, born in the same year as the State of Israel was established, came to Canada in 1969 after service in the Israeli army.

Mazon makes largest allocation

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mazon Canada, which bills itself as the Jewish response to hunger, announced recently its largest-ever allocation of funds to organizations that feed the hungry.

Mazon's springtime allocation of $89,980 to 73 grassroots beneficiary organizations brings Mazon's grand total since its inception in 1987 to $862,000.

The largest single allocations went to Bikur Cholim of Toronto, Tomchai Shabbos of Toronto and Tomchai Shabbos of Montreal, each of which received $4,000.

Mazon allocations are made on a non-sectarian basis to organizations that sponsor programs to feed the hungry. Other groups to receive funds include the Community Food Basket of Saint John, N.B. ($1,000), the Cowichan Valley Basket Society of Duncan, B.C. ($1,000), East Wellington Advisory Group for Family Services, Erin, Ont. ($750), and the Manna Food Bank, Bracebridge, Ont. ($1,500).

Lori Burke, executive-director of Mazon, said funds for the spring allocation were raised largely at a Food Fest sponsored by kosher caterers in Montreal in November 1995 and through Mazon's Passover campaign, in which pledge cards were distributed on synagogue pews and through shul bulletins. Other sources of funds include sale of Mazon's occasion cards and sale of Passover place cards.

Mazon's goal for 1996 is $175,000. If successful, that would exceed its 1995 total by more than $20,000 and continue a trend of yearly growth. In its first year of operation, Mazon allocated $25,000.

In other developments, Mazon announced that Marilyn Aarons-Guttman, the organization's former executive-director, has returned as a board member. Roz Goodman, a community volunteer from Montreal, has also joined the board.

Lubavitch shul set for Markham

TORONTO — After months of negotiation, a settlement has been reached between Chabad Lubavitch of Markham and Canac Kitchens regarding the rezoning of a two-acre site for a synagogue on Green Lane in the Thornhill neighborhood of Markham.

The agreement signed by both parties on March 31 ended a year-long dispute and drawn out legal battle that was to appear before the Ontario Municipal Board in June.

As early as May 1995, Markham Council unanimously approved the re-zoning at 83 Green Lane for the purpose of developing a 30,000-square-foot synagogue centre on the site. The synagogue was to include a 600-seat sanctuary, a nursery school, a Hebrew school and a youth centre. Then the growing congregation received news that an appeal was submitted by five industrial neighbors, spearheaded by Canac Kitchens.

Chabad initially tried to meet the appellants and explain why they should not be concerned. But the appellants seemed determined to take their case to the Ontario Municipal Board, which would have been extremely costly and time consuming.

In December 1995, however, Canac came to the negotiating table for an out of court settlement. The settlement included an agreement by both sides not to interfere with each other's lawful activities and to have a fence on the perimeter of the property installed.

To meet the building goals, a community fundraising dinner was held on April 15, sponsored by Eric and Lynette Inspektor and Larry and Beryl Weltman at Le Parc Banquet Hall. Over 200 people attended and over $200,000 cash was raised.

The congregation has organized the necessary funding for a 1.5-million Phase I project.

Once in effect, the deal will mean that most tariffs on items imported and exported by the two countries will disappear virtually overnight. Eggleton says there will be no phase-in period.

The minister calls it a levelling of the playing field. Trade officials say bilateral trade between Israel and Canada will triple as a result. Some tariffs will remain on agricultural and fish products.

Canadian industries standing to benefit most will be in the hi-tech area. Already, several joint ventures have been sealed between Canadian and Israeli hi-tech companies.

Eggleton notes that the pact creating the Canada-Israel Industrial Research and Development Fund, signed in 1993 by then prime ministers Shimon Peres and Brian Mulroney, has grown to a value of $6 million, split between Israeli and Canadian government contributions.

He points out that the fund has become so popular that both Alberta and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, headed by Norman Spector, a former Canadian ambassador to Israel, want to contribute to it.

And he says that Canadian businesses specializing in lumber, construction materials and prefabricated housing will finally be able to ship their products to Israel duty-free, after years of being blocked out due to high Israeli tariffs.

Eggleton, a former Toronto mayor chosen by Chrétien to run in York Centre, which has a sizeable Jewish population, has long been a visible presence on the Jewish scene and is viewed as a friend of Israel and the community.

The deal "will not only advance trade and investment, but I think it will bring our two countries closer together and further develop the political friendship between Canada and Israel," he feels.

Eggleton visited Israel in 1992 and met with then prime minister Yitzhak Shamir and opposition leader Rabin. Two years before, he visited Auschwitz, an experience that left an indelible impression.

Thus, he's particularly proud of his government's passage of Bill C–41, the law that will enhance penalties for crimes of hate, and of the recent passing of amendment to the Human Rights Code outlawing discrimination against homosexuals.

He calls opposition to both bills, even among his Liberal colleagues, "wrong."

"These matters should have been before the courts a long time ago," including, he allows, the years the Liberals were in power throughout the 1960s and '70s. "The biological clock ticks on and [prosecutions] become more difficult, as the courts are finding out. But we're in the courts now, and I know our government is doing everything possible to move [cases] along.

"Justice should still prevail in these cases. These people may be old, but still, justice is important to pursue."

Jewish choirs raise voices at Zimriya

BARBARA SILVERSTEIN

Eight choirs from across Toronto performed for an audience of about 900 at the festival of Jewish choral music held at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The Zimriya was presented by Jewish Music-Toronto, which operates under the auspices of the Koffler Centre for the Arts and the Bathurst Jewish Centre.

"This was our biggest and best attended concert in recent years," said Charles Heller, vice-president of Jewish Music-Toronto and chair of The 1996 Zimriya. He had been preparing for the concert, whose theme was Jerusalem, City of David, for two years, he added.

Participating this year were the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, Kol Shira, Temple Kol Ami Choir, Lachan-Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir, Zemer Chorale of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Temple Emanu-el, Holy Blossom Temple Singers and the Beth Tikvah Synagogue Choir.

The Yerushalayim Mosaic, the grand finale of the evening, was commissioned by Jewish Music-Toronto with the help of a grant from the Ontario Arts Council. It was composed by Yefim Adler, who came to Toronto from the former Soviet Union, with a text by Cantor Benjamin Maissner, Naomi Bell and Judith R. Cohen.

The Yerushalayim Mosaic, was conducted by Esther Ghan Firestone, conductor of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, and sung by the 140-member Zimriya Chorus, made up of seven of the eight participating choirs.

Composer Srul Irving Glick, conductor of Kol Shira and the Beth Tikvah Synagogue Choir, led the Beth Tikvah Choir in their performance of the two other works that premiered: Di Nacht, a Yiddish poem by Ida Maza with music by Helen Greenberg and In Memory of Yitzhak Rabin, a poem by Donia Blumenfeld Clenman with music by Glick.

Solo performances were given by Cantor Louis Danto with the Zemer Chorale of Beth Emeth conducted by Heller, and by Cantor Anna Trubashnik of Temple Emanu-el, who sang with her temple choir conducted by Amy Gilbert.

Cantor Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple conducted both his temple choir and the Lachan-Toronto Jewish Chamber Choir.

Daniel Berlin, conductor of Temple Kol Ami Choir, was one of the only conductors who is not a professional musician. "We're just a bunch of amateurs practising in the basement. We do it for the love of music," he said.

Is Canada drifting?

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — At times it seems as if the federal government has no plan at all to save Canada and is just drifting helplessly towards the next referendum.

Prime Minister Jean Chrétien is acting as if it's only a matter of time until the next Quebec referendum is held, and has already begun laying down Ottawa's minimal demands in the negotiations that are sure to follow.

To federalists outside the small, intense political community in Ottawa, it often seems as if Quebec Premier Lucien Bouchard does whatever he wants, goes from victory to victory and never has a setback.

The reality is far different. Right now, the outcome of the national unity debate in Quebec is anything but decided. The balance of power shifts back and forth between federalists and separatists at least once a week, sometimes twice a day.

The unity debate is taking more twists and turns than a pretzel. And the worst thing anyone who feels strongly about Canada or Quebec can do right now is not pay attention to what's happening.

First Bouchard decided he wanted to make peace with his anglos, for reasons that remain obscure.

So on his own, without consulting the Parti Québécois (PQ) rank and file, he concocted a plan to water down Quebec's language law to please the anglophone minority and foreign business interests.

The language hardliners in the PQ got wind of it and there was hell to pay for Bouchard. It's not so much the plan, which is hardly generous; it's simply that his failure to consult them confirmed their worst fears, exactly what they had been told about his autocratic style.

Although he meant well, Bouchard's credibility with his own party was damaged; he angered his hardliners, who forced him to back down, and disappointed the anglos, for whom he can't deliver.

Meanwhile, back in Ottawa, for reasons that are equally obscure, Chrétien decided to get Ottawa involved in the legal plans of Quebec City lawyer Guy Bertrand to contest Quebec's right to self-determination before the courts.

It's a no-win situation for the federal government. It is structured before the courts as Bertrand's case. Ottawa can't dictate the process. If Bertrand loses, then Ottawa is legally bound to accept the decision. If Bertrand wins, then Ottawa ends up looking as if it doesn't recognize Quebec's right to self-determination, which almost every Quebecer, separatist or federalist, recognizes unequivocally. Either way it's a lose-lose situation.

If Ottawa had really wanted a court ruling on the process of separation, it could have asked a "question" of the Supreme Court. It could have even loaded the question to get the answer it wanted, instead of being obliged to hang on to Bertrand's legal coattails, without knowing where he's running.

Instead of staying out of this mess, Bouchard jumped in with both feet, petulantly announcing that he was so angry at Ottawa he was going to refuse to meet Chrétien in June to talk about Quebec-Canada issues. Quebecers were outraged. Bouchard sounded like Newt Gingrich shutting down the U.S. government because he had to ride in the back of the presidential plane.

Within two weeks, Bouchard swallowed his pride and announced he had changed his mind. He would meet Chrétien after all. He had better. Quebecers would not have stood for it.

Then there's the Ottawa mindset. Chrétien keeps talking as if Bouchard is sure to win the next referendum, which by law, can only be held after the next provincial election.

Johnson, who had told Ottawa in the strongest terms possible to stay out of Bertrand's court adventure, was once again cut off at the knees by his friends in Ottawa. Bouchard was able to use Chrétien's words to humiliate Johnson publicly in Quebec.

Finally Johnson had enough and announced publicly that if Chrétien didn't smarten up, he would wind up being Canada's last prime minister. It can't get any clearer than that.

And then suddenly, just when everybody thought that Ottawa was firmly into Plan B and was about to start dividing up the furniture with Quebec, out popped a federal plan, promised by Chrétien in the final days of the referendum campaign, to hand over federal manpower training to the provinces, including Quebec. It's what every Quebec premier, fédéralist or separatist, from Jean Lesage down through Robert Bourassa and René Lévesque, has been seeking.

The wind went out of Bouchard's sails. He stammered that it was "a step in the right direction."

What else could he say?

If he said it was not good enough, he would alienate the soft nationalist vote, the 20 percent of the Quebec electorate seeking a halfway solution to Quebec's constitutional problems.

Bouchard, like Chrétien, has to keep one eye all the time on the soft nationalists who hold the balance of power between the hardline federalists and separatists in Quebec.

A Salute to our Community's Volunteers

"Do not separate yourself from the community"
Pirke Avot 2:5

Some Thoughts on Volunteers

Rabbi Ronald Weiss,
Director Chaplaincy Services
Jewish Family and Child Service

Towards the beginning of the second chapter of Pirke Avot (2:4) we are told of the famous teaching of Hillel: "al tifrosh min ha tzibur," "do not separate yourself from the community." Beyond the obvious meaning, what is the message that this Mishnah seeks to convey?

According to Rav Yisroel Lipschutz, in his commentary Tiferes Yisroel, there are five distinct areas of application being addressed by these words. We are advised not to separate ourselves from 1) the customs 2) decisions or 3) troubles of the community; 4) we are urged to include the collective welfare of our people in our individual prayers, and 5) the leaders of the community must not be detached, distant or indifferent to the people they serve.

In a large and diverse community such as ours, common customs are rare and communal decisions often difficult to enforce. We all feel the troubles of the community, whether we are speaking of our local Metropolitan area or identifying with our fellow Jews in Israel. Consequently, I believe we do have the collective welfare of our people in the forefront of our thoughts, prayers and activities at all times.

Yet, because of the multifaceted nature of our community - where Jews come from a variety of backgrounds, levels of affiliation and commitment - the phrase "al tifrosh min ha tzibur," "do not separate yourself from the community" takes on a unifying character. We must strive to hold our community together and grow together as Jews.

To truly foster unity, I believe we must all stress those issues which we all recognize as crucial to our survival. Two specific areas of endeavour immediately come to mind: first, strengthening the people and State of Israel through our active and passionate support. And, second, strengthening and enhancing Jewish life in our own community through our individual active involvement.

Volunteers are truly the fuel that drives the engine of the Jewish community. Whatever we are able to accomplish as a community is only due to the united concerted efforts of volunteers whose dedicated work furthers our collective and communal benefit.

We are told in the Talmud (Taanit 11a) that all those who join together with the community in its times of trouble will be found worthy to its redemption.

"Al tifrosh min ha tzibur," "do not separate yourself from the community." On the contrary, may all of our efforts on behalf of our community be blessed with success.

Volunteerism is an essential expression of 'tzedakah'. Together with our financial contributions to maintain our Jewish community and its human service, Jewish education and overseas rescue activities, our personal commitment to work as a member of the community is an invaluable resource in our individual and communal search for social justice.

We are fortunate in knowing the importance of our volunteer work and in the satisfaction we derive from seeing the value and benefit it brings to our Jewish community as well as to the broader Greater Toronto community.

Through volunteer activity and involvement, we help to build our Jewish community and manifest our commitment to future generations.

Let us continue together in strength and confidence in ourselves and in the future.

Ontario

Dear Friends:

As Ontario's Minister of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation, I am delighted to pay tribute to the outstanding volunteers showcased in this special feature of The Canadian Jewish News.

One of our greatest sources of pride in Ontario is the strength and vitality of our communities. This is due in great measure to the efforts of nearly two million volunteers across the province. Through their commitment to partnership, co-operation and hard work, these dedicated individuals make Ontario a better place for all of us to live, work and raise our families.

Ontario's Jewish community has a long and enlightened history when it comes to promoting and encouraging volunteerism. The individuals featured on these pages are representative of the leadership, imagination and compassion shown by volunteers in all areas of Jewish community life. I am grateful to the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and The Canadian Jewish News for recognizing their accomplishments.

I hope that by reading about these special individuals and their contribution to the quality of life in their community, others will be encouraged to seek out volunteer opportunities of their own.

Sincerely, Marilyn Mushinski

Making a Difference

by Francie Storm
Immediate Past Chair, Department for Human Resources Development
Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto

The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto is delighted to once again recognize volunteers from all aspects of our Jewish community. These men, women and young adults, pictured in these pages, represent only a small number of the dedicated individuals who give so freely of their time to help keep our community strong and viable.

The "not-for-profit" sector is undergoing a radical change. The impact of shrinking financial resources is felt in all areas of service delivery. As programs and services are withdrawn, the lives of a significant number of people will be seriously affected. More than ever, we need to recognize and support the work of volunteers who, at all levels, struggle to sustain and redefine our services as we move into the next century.

The volunteers we salute today do make a difference! Their dedication and commitment to their organizations speak for itself. Their tireless efforts, in these difficult times, will ensure the continuity of our communal organizational life.

These individuals represent a broad spectrum of the community. They are an example of our most precious resource - our people. We all take pride in the marvelous contribution these folks have made to the community and thank their organizations for letting us share in the recognition of these wonderful volunteers.

Yasher Koach to each and every one of you!

A Tradition of Excellence

Jack Chisvin, this year's most outstanding community leader. The Ben Sadowski Award of Merit, presented by the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, is the community's most prestigious service award.

Jack Chisvin Named for "Sadowski" Award

Former UJA Federation President Jack Chisvin, currently the National President of Canadian Technion Society has received this year's prestigious Ben Sadowski Award of Merit. Jack is among our community's most tireless leaders and a UJA Federation fundraiser for 41 years. Jack founded the Commission on Jewish Education and served as the first Toronto Chairman of Project Renewal, through which UJA Federation has helped to revitalize several Israeli communities.

In addition to his dedicated efforts on behalf of UJA Federation, Jack is a Canada-Israel Committee Board member and a Past President of the Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue Brotherhood. He and his wife, Phyllis, have three children and eight grandchildren.

"The spirit of volunteerism is addictive - the more you do it, the more you crave it. But unlike other addictive spirits, it is benign - and at times can even be therapeutic. Volunteerism can also be contagious. If you are exposed to an environment where volunteerism flourishes you can become contaminated and inexplicably get involved - and that's good because it's the right thing to do."

Leadership Development Awards Presented

Leadership Development Award winners Heather Milstein (left) and Robert Furman with Francie Storm. LD awards were established to encourage the assumption of community leadership by young men and women and are presented each year to those who demonstrate extraordinary community commitment and service.

Heather Milstein

Heather is a social worker with the Children's Aid Society of Metro Toronto and a member of the Jewish Camp Council Board.

As a graduate of UJA Federation's Leadership Development Program, Heather has continued to be an active UJA canvasser and strong supporter of a wide variety of UJA Federation activities. She is the 1997 campaign Co-chair of the UJA Federation's Young Professionals Network and currently serves on the Leadership Development Committee of UJA Federation's Human Resource Development Department.

"Volunteering for the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto has afforded me the opportunity to make some wonderful friends and share with them some great experiences. One such experience was the 1994 Mission to Prague and Israel. I have been able to learn a great deal about my community and myself. I am extremely honoured to receive this award and look forward to my continued affiliation with UJA Federation."

Robert Furman

Robert is a chartered accountant who has been the President of Toronto Jewish Immigrant Aid Services since 1994.

A graduate of the Young Leadership Development Program, Robert Co-chaired UJA Federation's Accountants Division and served on the UJA Federation Integration Subcommittee and the Council of Jewish Federations' Task Force on Immigration Planning.

"Some people have asked me how and why I became a volunteer. It all began with the experience of being an oppressed stranger in the Soviet Union and then arriving in a new land where I was welcomed by a strong and vibrant Jewish community. I became a volunteer because others in our community demonstrated to me their commitment to the well-being of all Jewish families and the continuity of the Jewish people. I developed a reciprocal commitment to return to our community what I had so generously received."

Volunteers Do Make A Difference

When Judi Sporn, a grandmother of 3, contacted the Department for Human Resources of UJA Federation to discuss volunteer opportunities, she was already involved as a community volunteer. Following an interview, she was invited to become an interviewer on the Volunteer Development Committee.

As a member of the interview team, Judi has shared her experience and knowledge of the community with the many individuals she has interviewed. Her insights and skills as an interviewer have led to many successful referrals.

Today, four years later, Judi also continues to volunteer as an active member of the Holocaust Education Week Committee and a guide at the Holocaust Education Centre.

In recent years, the financial and human resources on which our community has relied have decreased significantly. As a result, agencies and organizations are finding it difficult to keep up with the demands placed on them. The world of volunteering today has evolved into an exciting array of important, prestigious and vital activity at all levels of community life. You can join the many active volunteers in our community by calling our office to arrange an interview. Judi did; we hope you will too!

WHAT'S THE DIFFERENCE? YOU ARE!
Become a community volunteer.

Community Matters

Annual Meeting

UJA Federation focuses on the future

UJA Federation Chairman David Goldstein (right) shares a story and a laugh with Martin Storm.

A family affair. Both Jack Chisvin and daughter Karen Chisvin received awards of recognition for many years of community service.

The primary community role played by UJA Federation was the key theme at last week's Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto annual meeting. "We have reaffirmed the primacy of UJA Federation," said President Sandra Brown.

Through its annual campaign, UJA Federation raises funds for local educational and social services, the rescue of Jews from unstable regions and essential projects in Israel. The Bequest and Endowment Fund also contributes to the community's financial security. This year, UJA Federation will be conducting both its annual campaign in addition to rejuvenating endowment and capital fundraising.

Sandra Brown paid tribute to Harry Krakowski who is retiring from the Federation's Board of Directors after serving an amazing 8 year term.

Brown cited the financial pressure facing Jewish agencies due to government cutbacks. "Never before," she stressed, "has integrated fund-raising been so important."

Annual meeting program highlights included a video and slide presentation of a new UJA Federation marketing initiative proclaiming Jewish community pride, award presentations and a performance by the Bialik Day School Choir under the direction of Doron Ophir.

Recapping the year, Brown applauded the work undertaken by UJA Federation in Jewish continuity through an innovative grants program, outreach to young people with Junior UJA programs, Holocaust education and building bridges to other communities.

"The strides we have made are numerous," she said, "but the challenges facing us are manifold."

ISRAEL BOUND

Pictured above are some of the 15 Toronto university students who will be teaching English to Israeli teens this summer in the Project Renewal communities of Eilat, Kfar Gvirol and Or Yehuda.

The program, called Kefiada, is sponsored by UJA Federation's Jewish Campus Services, Israel's Ministry of Education, and the Israel Association of Community Centres.

Community Marchers Raise $150,000

A sea of sneakers, strollers, seniors, infants and everyone in-between. That's what north Bathurst Street looked like on the morning of Sunday May 26, during the UJA Federation Community March for Israel.

Well over 5,000 people who turned out for the March were joined by 2,000 others at the Jerusalem 3000 Festival, co-sponsored by Canadian Zionist Federation. "We were absolutely thrilled to see so much support for this wonderful community event," said Jeff Cohen, who co-chaired this year's March, Journey to Jerusalem, with Maura Cooperberg.

About $150,000 was raised on behalf of recently arrived young immigrants in Israel.

Former premier Bob Rae, whose brother lost his life to leukemia, visited the clinic along with other community leaders.

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL COMMUNITY MARCH FOR ISRAEL

Anyone for a foot massage? Two weary walkers stop for a rest along the way.

Learn-a-thon

UNITED JEWISH APPEAL COMMUNITY MARCH FOR ISRAEL

Eighty-two year old Hannah Rensler, the oldest Marcher on the UJA Federation Community March for Israel, led the way with eight year old Jamie Filer, who raised over $800, and the Philosophe brothers – Natanel, 9 and Eliezer, 6 – each of whom brought in $500.

Behind them was a potpourri of people of all ages and all walks of life reflecting Toronto's diverse Jewish community.

The March occured on Sunday, May 26, 1996.

Hannah Rensler has been participating in the March for 8 years.

Hadassah-WIZO chapters lauded in western Canada

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — Lily Frank, executive vice-president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, was in Western Canada recently to bring a mazel tov to two pioneer Hadassah-WIZO organizations.

She was in Regina for the local Hadassah-WIZO chapter's 75th anniversary, and in Victoria for the 70th anniversary of the chapter there. She then spent two days in Vancouver.

Earlier, Frank was in Edmonton to pay tribute to Cori Friedman, honorary vice-president, who was named that city's Woman of the Year.

The several Regina chapters began to dwindle in the 1980s, with the shift of the population away from the city.

Thus, Hadassah-WIZO efforts there, in addition to promoting projects in Israel, began to focus on Jewish-Christian relations. Non-denominational sessions were held to discuss violence against women and, more recently, violence against youth.

At the luncheon meeting in Victoria, Frank praised chapter president Ana Porzecanski for her work. She also lauded the Today's Woman chapter which, with the Victoria chapter, has made the annual Chocolate Sunday a city-wide event and the most successful of such projects in Canada since its launch in 1992.

Frank told The CJN that the annual Youth Aliyah campaign will get under way shortly, but pointed out that the Youth Aliyah movement was restructured by the previous Israeli government.

A number of Youth Aliyah projects, particularly in the education field, will be taken over by the government, in cooperation with the Jewish Agency and education ministry.

But most medical and social service programs operated by Hadassah-WIZO will continue to function as they do now, including Youth Aliyah, which has been a Canadian program since the early 1930s.

Frank discussed plans for Canadian Hadassah-WIZO's triennial convention, to be held at the Sheraton Centre in Toronto in November.

Immediately following the convention, delegates will be able join a Jerusalem 3000 tour to Israel.

Ontario public servant welcomes her new position in Ottawa

By PAUL MCKEAGUE
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA – When the Mike Harris government was elected last year, it informed Thea Herman that her services as deputy minister in the Ontario Ministry of Labor would no longer be required. It could have been a devastating blow to a woman who had risen to the top of the province's public service in only 10 years.

But it now looks more like a blessing.

The federal government almost immediately began to make overtures when Herman lost her job. In only a few months the Toronto lawyer was Ottawa-bound with a new position that puts her in charge of policy development for Canada's Department of Justice.

"It's a wonderful job," says Herman, who has been the head of the department's policy sector since the end of November. She's responsible for developing legislation and policy options for Justice Minister Allan Rock on matters ranging from criminal and family law to social issues and human rights.

"I was interested in the job because there's lots happening," Herman says. "The minister is intelligent and energetic and it was a chance to be able to accomplish things, to have a challenge."

She is too much of a professional public servant to discuss why the Harris government wanted her gone as it prepared to implement its "common sense revolution."

"It's the prerogative of any government, particularly any new government, to choose the deputy ministers," she says, diplomatically closing the door on the subject. But it's a good bet that the right-wing Ontario government would have felt uncomfortable working with a senior public servant who had devoted most of her career to issues such as human rights, pay equity and social justice concerns.

Thea Herman

Such concerns emerged naturally out of Herman's Jewish upbringing in Toronto. Her father, the late lawyer Louis Herman, was involved with the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, B'nai Brith and "a variety of community endeavors related to human rights issues and discrimination," Herman recalls.

Her mother, Miriam Bookman, has been very active in the sisterhood of Holy Blossom Temple. She also writes for The Canadian Jewish News under her old name, Miriam Herman.

Herman studied at the University of Toronto's Faculty of Law and worked at a community legal clinic for low-income people for three years after being admitted to the bar in 1978. She then served as legal counsel to the Ontario Human Rights Commission, worked on policy development at the Ontario Ministry of the Attorney General and then in 1988 became the ministry's deputy director of equality rights.

After helping develop employment equity legislation and working as a policy advisor to the Ontario cabinet, she became deputy minister in the Ministry of Labor in 1994.

When she lost that job, "it was hard," Herman admits. She'd spent years in the Ontario government and moving to Ottawa meant leaving the city where she'd grown up and the many friends she has there.

It also posed family complications. Herman is married to lawyer Gregory King and has three teenage sons. Fortunately, King was able to move to a law office in Ottawa, where the family now has its home.

It's a challenging time for someone with strong concerns about human rights. The federal government's recent move to protect the rights of gays and lesbians aroused strong objections. And many Canadians are exasperated with the rights and protections afforded to prisoners and people charged with violent crimes.

"The times are difficult and when times are difficult it's difficult for people to be tolerant," Herman says. But it's not clear whether Canadians are on the whole more or less tolerant than they were in the past, she adds.

Herman is now working on a dizzying array of projects ranging from the development of new child support legislation to the drafting of regulations for Canada's new, tougher gun control laws.

A review of the Young Offenders Act is underway and many aspects of the criminal justice system are being revamped with the aim of better protecting Canadians. Herman is happy to be right in the thick of it all.

Canadian teen to receive Bronfman Youth Fellowship

MONTREAL — Jenna Slotin, a Grade 11 student at Canterbury High School, is the only Canadian to receive a 1996 Bronfman Youth Fellowship.

The fellowships honor 26 teenagers in the United States and Canada under a program designed to develop future community leaders committed to the concept of Jewish unity.

Jenna Slotin

This summer, Slotin will spend five weeks in Israel with the Youth Fellowships program launched 10 years ago by Edgar M. Bronfman, chair of the Seagram Company Ltd. and president of the World Jewish Congress.

The 26 fellows — chosen from nearly 450 applicants — were selected on the basis of character, intellectual interest, special talents and leadership qualities.

Slotin, daughter of Linda and Lewis Slotin, is enrolled in her school's dramatic arts program as a special triple credit theatre major.

She has won numerous public speaking awards in both English and French and holds a number of positions on intermediate and senior student councils. Slotin is active in school sports and is a lifeguard for the school swim team. A peer counsellor and math tutor for the past two years, she has also participated in theatre production at Canterbury as producer, director, stage-manager and actor.

Outside of school, Slotin volunteers at a local Jewish senior citizens home and takes classes in ballet, theatre and piano. She is a past vice-president of her Reform youth group and continues to be active in her synagogue.

The 14 girls and 12 boys who received the fellowships will fly to Israel on July 9, following an orientation seminar in New York City, and will return to the United States on Aug. 14.

They will spend their five weeks in Israel in a program of study, travel and dialogue with members of the educational staff of the Bronfman Fellowship program, as well as with prominent political and literary figures, representing a broad spectrum of views on key political, social and religious issues facing world Jewry.

Judaic studies program launched

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Rabbi Mordechai Green, president of Maimonides College, has announced the re-establishment of degree-granting Judaic studies programs.

Courses at the college were suspended several years ago, but starting Oct. 7, Maimonides, in conjunction with McMaster University of Hamilton, will offer university level courses for women at the Eitz Chaim schools in Toronto.

For male students, Maimonides College will offer undergraduate and graduate credit courses within a beit midrash program in Hamilton, which will be run in cooperation with Yeshiva Beit Yitzchak of Hamilton.

Maimonides College will offer a full range of courses leading to BA, MA and PhD degrees in an Orthodox Jewish environment.

Students will have several options. They will be able to study full time in the beit midrash, earning a Maimonides BA, or combine the beit midrash program with evening and summer courses at McMaster University. In addition, Maimonides plans to offer correspondence courses as well as courses on the Internet, which will allow students to complete their courses at their own pace.

Working in conjunction with McMaster University, Maimonides College will use state of the art technology to expand its range of courses in both secular and non-secular subjects, Rabbi Green announced.

John Letnik, who has been a restaurauteur since 1957, still has customers from his first restaurant at Dundas and McCaul. He opened Captain John's in 1970, but replaced the original ship with a new one in 1975. In the restaurant business, Captain John's staying power tells you he must be doing something right.

Part of the secret of his staying power is the menu, mainly seafood, including the biggest lobster in town. Captain John's is also famous for beef Stroganoff, surf 'n' turf and New York steak. Then, of course, there is the romance of dining, or simply enjoying a drink, on the water.

Captain John's is open 7 days a week for lunch & dinner and Sunday brunch. There is also a Vegas-style dinner show once a month.

Captain John's caters weddings, bar or bat mitzvahs and company functions; weddings have even been performed on board. Besides the main dining room with its intimate atmosphere, there are two banquet rooms which seat 70 and 260 guests.

Captain John's was one of Canada's first floating restaurants, and is still the only one John Letnik knows of in Ontario. It is docked at 1 Queen's Quay W., at the foot of Yonge St.; call 416-363-6062.

Syria talks, coalition partners top Netanyahu's agenda

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu is juggling.

As he reaches out to potential coalition partners to form the next Israeli government, he is also reaching out to the Arab world.

Last week he said he believed he could continue peace negotiations with Syria, without getting stalled over the issue of the Golan Heights.

"I think there are additional ways to advance confidence-building between Syria and Israel and alleviate the tension and existing situation of hostility ahead of full peace and a peace treaty," he told reporters in Haifa.

Netanyahu has previously said he believes Israel and Syria could try to pursue sub-agreements on such areas as water and economic arrangements.

Although he opposes returning the Golan Heights to Syria, he said no one should question his intention to conduct negotiations with Damascus.

"We have already had talks. We started at [the 1991] Madrid peace conference and we made it clear to Assad that we will remain on the Golan Heights."

Syria has called on Israel to resume peace negotiations, which were suspended by the outgoing government following a series of suicide bombings by Islamic militants in February and March.

Last weekend, Syrian President Hafez al-Assad hosted Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah to discuss the future of the peace process in the wake of the Israeli political shake-up.

Officials in Jordan said King Hussein would travel to Washington next week to meet with President Bill Clinton. The officials said the trip was "personal" and had been planned prior to the elections.

Meanwhile, American officials said Netanyahu would travel to Washington at the end of the month.

Aides to the new prime minister denied Israeli media reports that the visit had been set for June 25, pending formation of the new government.

Legislation on the religious status quo is shaping up to be one of the toughest issues the Likud will have to tackle.

The religious parties have presented a list of demands that would give the Orthodox establishment more influence over daily life. The Likud must balance these against the programs of its other potential coalition partners, which are secular.

The religious parties' request to limit the creation of secular cemeteries, for example, is a sore point for the immigrant party, Israel b'Aliyah, which supports their construction.

Netanyahu said only that he would try to meet the interests of all sectors of the population.

Couple killed in terrorist shooting

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – A husband and wife were shot dead near Moshav Gefen last Sunday night, apparently by terrorists in a passing car.

A witness said the attackers' car quickly overtook that of the victims and a burst of fire tore into the car, which ran off the road into a gully. The terrorists' car continued travelling, apparently in the direction of the territories.

Witness Yehuda Mesala, who was travelling behind the victims' car, stopped his car to provide assistance. Mesala, who is disabled and wheelchair bound, pulled himself up to the couple's car and found the husband dead behind the steering wheel and his wife dead beside him in the front passenger seat.

In the back seat, Mesala found the couple's 1-year-old daughter unhurt, still strapped into her car seat. The baby was later taken to Kaplan Hospital for observation.

Police Inspector-General Assaf Hefetz, who arrived at the scene with a massive force which began a search of the area, said the incident was "apparently a drive-by terrorist attack, although the possibility that it was a roadside ambush has not been ruled out."

Police blocked off main highways in the centre of the country in a manhunt for the attackers and increased security throughout the region.

Montreal, Tel Aviv mayors seeks closer cooperation

By LEORA FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

TEL AVIV – Montreal Mayor Pierre Bourque and Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo signed a declaration of intent to tighten links between the two cities during Bourque's recent visit to Israel – the first ever by a Montreal mayor.

The proposed agreement, which must be approved by both city councils, would pave the way for cooperation in urban planning, mass transit, cultural affairs, social services, the environment and economic and technological exchanges.

The mayor praised the rapid pace of development in Tel Aviv, calling it a "booming city," but appeared especially moved by his visit to Jerusalem.

"I now understand why this country was created," Bourque told The CJN. "I've discovered Israel through Jerusalem. I'm amazed at what I saw and I will definitely be back."

Bourque led a delegation of Montreal business executives representing a dozen companies, including Gaz Metropolitain, Bombardier and HMS Energie, a subsidiary of Hydro Quebec, on a four-day visit to Israel.

While some members of the delegation expressed anxiety about the change in the Israeli government, most said they were reassured that investment opportunities would not be affected.

"I was glad to hear that there will be no drastic changes under the new Israeli prime minister," said Edward Blanshay, a Montreal lawyer who helps set up strategic partnerships between Canadian and Israeli companies.

"It's very important that investment continue and that the peace process continue."

"Traditionally the Likud is very open to free enterprise; so there is nothing to fear," added Saulie Zajdel, a member of the executive committee of the Montreal city council.

In Jerusalem, the mayor – a former director of the Montreal Botanical Gardens – opened a rose garden established with the support of Montreal Jewry.

He also visited the Jerusalem site of Genesis Israel, a community advocacy organization based on Montreal's Project Genesis. Since the Israeli version of the program began in 1992, it has recruited 75 volunteers who act as advocates for over 6,000 Israelis at storefront sites in Jerusalem, Beersheva and Acre.

"I was very proud to see a Montreal program having such an impact in Jerusalem," said Bourque. "The same philosophy works in both places: empower people by making them aware of their rights."

Canadian Ambassador to Israel David Berger called Genesis Israel a tremendous volunteer organization which has been especially helpful to new immigrants.

"People think that Canada and Israel have little in common, but this project shows that we have a lot to gain by working together," said Berger.

Bourke wound up his visit to Israel at the Gala des Etoiles – an annual Montreal ballet extravaganza that was brought to Jerusalem with the cooperation of the Canada Committee for Jerusalem 3000.

Peres' days as leader appear numbered

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Shimon Peres' days as the leader of the Labor party are numbered. Having been narrowly defeated by Benjamin Netanyahu in Israel's first direct election for prime minister, Peres is now a three-time loser, and will likely resign in the near future.

Mideast Analysis

The outcome could have been different. Under the old electoral system, Peres most probably would have regained his post and led Israel's next government. The final tally shows that the Labor party won 34 seats (26.8 percent), 10 less than in 1992, but two more than the Likud (25.1 percent).

Although the election race was too close to call, some observers expected Peres to muddle through, if only because of his past achievements. One of the founding fathers of the state, Peres is a distinguished public servant who has held practically every key position since the establishment of Israel in 1948.

During the War of Independence, he procured arms and munitions for the Haganah. Later, as director-general of the Ministry of Defence and deputy minister of defence, he presided over the construction of Israel's nuclear arsenal, and was instrumental in forging close security relations with France and West Germany.

As defence minister in the late Yitzhak Rabin's first government (1974-77), he played an integral role in the Entebbe hijacking incident. Then as prime minister and finance minister in a national unity government from 1984 to 1986, he slashed inflation and withdrew the army from all of Lebanon but a self-declared security zone adjacent to Israel's northern border.

And then, as foreign minister in Rabin's second government, he helped lay the groundwork for Israel's historic rapprochement with the PLO and fleshed out the Oslo accords and Israel's peace treaty with Jordan.

No wonder Netanyahu praised Peres in a speech following his victory. "I want to say something about Mr. Peres," he said. "We had our disagreements, we had strong disagreements, but no one among us should forget the important contributions that Mr. Peres has made to the State of Israel."

If Peres was such a stellar and respected figure, why did he lose the election? There are several reasons.

Like his martyred predecessor, Peres failed to bring Israel peace with security. Within days of the signing of the Declaration of Principles on Sept. 13, 1993, a spate of terrorism convulsed Israel. And the suicide bombings which killed 59 people in February and March appeared to be the final straw insofar as many Israelis were concerned.

The Likud hammered away at that theme, and during their only television debate before the election, Netanyahu charged Peres with "bringing our security to an unprecedented low."

Peres countered that Netanyahu was pandering to fear. Yet Peres was unable to convince the majority of Israelis that terrorism was not a function of the peace process. And neither was he able to persuade voters that peace had brought Israel unparallelled political and economic benefits.

Peres compiled a stellar record

Peres' election campaign strategy of moving to the right of the political spectrum and blurring the differences between himself and Netanyahu did not work either. Nor did his draconian decisions to seal off the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and to bombard Lebanon relentlessly in Operation Grapes of Wrath, which ended on an uncertain note.

If anything, the closure of the territories and the military operation in Lebanon tarnished Peres' image in the Israeli Arab community. True, nine out of 10 Israeli Arabs cast their ballots for Peres in the direct election. Yet, disillusioned with Peres' policies, a significant number of Arab voters made good on their threat to abstain.

Peres, and the Labor party, also lost ground to two new centrist parties — The Third Way and Israel b'Aliyah — which siphoned off potential voters. The Third Way and Israel b'Aliyah picked up a total of 11 Knesset seats and held the balance of power in the aftermath of the election.

As well, Peres struck out with Orthodox Jews, who heeded their rabbis and split their votes between the Likud and the three religious parties.

And finally, Peres' excruciatingly close loss in the head-to-head contest with Netanyahu can be ascribed to Likud's far-sighted, strategic decision to form a joint list with Rafael Eitan's Tsomet list and David Levy's Gesher party. In the last analysis, this catapulted Netanyahu over the top.

June 3

• Prof. Ariel Rosen-Tzvi died at the age of 52 from an illness, reported Israel Radio. Rosen-Tzvi was the dean of Tel Aviv University's Law Faculty and sat on several state commissions, most recently the commission that investigated the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin.

June 4

• Israel's first commercial communications satellite, Amos I, began sending experimental broadcasts. The satellite was launched two weeks ago from French Guiana.

June 5

• Israel further eased the closure of the territories, imposed in connection with the national elections. The Israeli army said married Palestinian workers older than 35 could apply for work permits that would allow them into the Jewish state.

June 6

• Israeli Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu said he would continue peace negotiations with Syria and final-status talks with the Palestinians. His remarks came as Syria announced that it would host a meeting with leaders of Egypt and Saudi Arabia to discuss the effect of the Israeli elections on the peace process.

June 7

• Former Mossad chief Shabtai Shavit, acknowledging a dispute with IDF intelligence, says he is not convinced that Syria is ready for peace with Israel. In an interview broadcast on Israel Radio, Shavit said, "I am realistic. The meaning is we have to relate to the process with caution and wisdom, and not get swept up by it."

Yeshiva University Developments

Drs. Bernard and Harold Shapiro, twin brothers from Montreal who are, respectively, principal and vice chancellor of McGill University and president of Princeton University, received honourary degrees from Yeshiva University at its 65th Annual Commencement in New York City.

The siblings—sons of Mary Shapiro Kantor and the late Max Shapiro—were cited for their pursuit of academic excellence and innovation and their staunch advocacy of higher education. In breaking with the tradition of awarding honourary degrees individually, YU President Norman Lamm simultaneously conferred upon the Shapiros honourary Doctor of Humane Lettres degrees.

"Born to the same parents on the same day in 1935, you have pursued distinct and distinguished academic careers that have brought each of you to the presidency of a prestigious North American university," said Dr. Lamm in presenting the degrees to the fraternal twins, both McGill alumni. "This is a rare and possibly unique achievement for any two brothers. But for two proudly Jewish brothers, it is without precedent and, thus, represents an important milestone in the history of both higher education and the North American Jewish community."

The other honourary degree recipients were:

- US Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, who also gave the Commencement address
- YU alumnus and Massachusetts businessman Aaron Feuerstein, who has been hailed for his humanitarianism on behalf of his employees after a fire destroyed his factory
- Esther Gottesman, lifelong Zionist and supporter of Jewish education, legendary Hadassah leader, and matriarch of one of YU's "First Families"
- Three-time YU alumnus Rabbi Daniel Tropper, founder and director of Gesher, the Jerusalem-based foundation which promotes relations between Israel's religious and secular Jews

Chaim Motzen of Cote Saint-Luc, among 11 Greater Montreal area residents in the 1996 Yeshiva University graduating classes, was selected earlier this year as one of America's "Top 20" college students by USA Today.

The national newspaper chose Motzen—son of Nechama and Cantor Yaakov Motzen of Adath Israel Congregation in Hampstead—from a pool of more than 1,200 candidates for its 1996 All-USA Academic Team based upon his classroom achievements, co- and extra-curricular endeavours, honours and awards, and the ability to express himself in writing.

Motzen, who was graduated with honours and is now a student at YU's affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS), was singled out in USA Today's coverage of team members. Featured with another winner in a story entitled "Among College All-Stars, Two Students Who Can't Stop Giving," he used the occasion to stress the importance of life-saving bone-marrow drives, a cause that is especially close to his heart.

Rabbi Benjamin Blech, assistant professor of Talmud at YU and author of the 1991 landmark book Understanding Judaism, was scholar-in-residence this year at Beth Zion Congregation, in Cote Saint-Luc.

The program host was Rabbi Sidney Shoham, Beth Zion's spiritual leader and namesake of a chair in Rabbinic and Community Leadership at RIETS. The chair, established in Rabbi Shoham's honour at a YU Convocation and Dinner in Montreal, is occupied by Rabbi Robert S. Hirt, RIETS vice president for administration and professional education.

THIRTY-SEVEN CANADIANS RECEIVE DEGREES

Thirty-seven Canadians are among the students who received undergraduate, graduate, or professional degrees or diplomas at YU's 65th Annual Commencement.

They were recipients of bachelour's or associate's degrees from Yeshiva College (YC), Stern College for Women (SCW), Sy Syms School of Business (SSSB), James Striar School of General Jewish Studies (JSS), or Isaac Breuer College of Hebraic Studies (IBC). Master's or doctoral degrees were conferred by Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education and Administration (AGS), Bernard Revel Graduate School (BRGS), Ferkauf Graduate School of Psychology (FGS), or Wurzweiler School of Social Work (WSSW).

Degrees from Albert Einstein College of Medicine and Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law will be presented later this month.

Three former Nazis lose U.S. citizenship

WASHINGTON — Three former Nazi henchmen have been stripped of their U.S. citizenship in the last three weeks, bringing to 56 the number of successful denaturalization cases brought by the Office of Special Investigations (OSI) since 1979.

A Federal District Court in Boston found that Aleksandras Lileikis, 88, of Norwood, Mass. had been chief of the Nazi-sponsored Lithuanian Security Police (Saugumas) in Vilnius and had played an integral role in the destruction of the Jewish community there.

Lileikis had handed Jews either to the Ypatingas Burys, a volunteer unit whose main function was to shoot Jews, or to the German Security Police, the OSI stated in a news release. Many of the killings took place at pits dug in the woods at Paneriai (Ponary in Yiddish).

In a separate case, a District Court judge in Tampa, Fla., entered a consent judgement in which Juozas (Joseph) Budreika, 79, admitted serving in a Lithuanian battalion involved in numerous mass killings of Jews and others. Budreika admitted he served in the 2nd/12th Lithuanian Schutzmannschaft (Protective Detachment) Battalion and that he concealed that fact when he applied for U.S. citizenship.

During 1941 and 1942, the unit murdered thousands of unarmed Jews and other civilians in Lithuania and Byelorussia (now Belarus).

"The cancellation of Budreika's ill-gotten U.S. citizenship is another important law enforcement victory on behalf of the victims of wartime Nazi oppression," said OSI director Eli Rosenbaum.

In yet another case, a District Court judge found that Detroit-area resident Ferdinand Hammer, 74, had served in the SS Death's Head Battalion, had been a guard at both the Auschwitz and Sachsenhausen concentration camps and had served as an armed SS guard while prisoners were transported between concentration camps.

During his naturalization application process, Hammer had signed a sworn affidavit in which he specifically stated he had never been a concentration camp guard and had never sent anyone to a concentration camp. However, District Court Judge Horace Gilmore found that Hammer fraudulently misrepresented his wartime activities in that statement.

Netanyahu renews Pollards' hopes

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Imprisoned U.S. spy for Israel Jonathan Pollard is hopeful that Benjamin Netanyahu will keep an election pledge to make his release a top priority, says Pollard's Toronto-based wife.

Esther Pollard met with both Netanyahu and Shimon Peres just days before the Israeli vote. She commended the prime minister-elect for issuing a "national unity" call for Pollard's release.

Following a May 21 meeting with Esther Pollard, Netanyahu said Jonathan Pollard must be released now, "because it's the right thing to do, and it's long overdue."

Esther Pollard has met with Peres and Netanyahu on several previous occasions, including during Netanyahu's trips to Toronto. She told The CJN her husband remains hopeful, but that neither of them favors one leader over another.

"We have always supported any Israeli leader and we are deeply grateful to both [Peres and Netanyahu]. The fact that I was received by them just 48 hours before the election is meaningful."

Pollard, a former U.S. Navy civilian analyst, is completing his 11th year in prison for passing classified data to Israel. He's currently in a jail in Butner, N.C.

Despite years of pressure from Jewish organizations and Israeli persistence, U.S. President Bill Clinton denied Pollard clemency in 1994.

Pollard supporters were also disheartened this past spring when White House Chief of Staff Leon Panetta said he doubted the president would commute Pollard's life sentence.

Last December, Pollard filed another application for executive clemency. His lawyer, Larry Dub, told The CJN last week the file "is sitting on a pile of dust" somewhere in the U.S. Justice Department.

He said Clinton could commute Pollard's sentence "now or in six months or years from now."

Esther Pollard said recent responses Clinton has sent to those who have written him about Pollard shouldn't be taken too seriously, as they are form letters.

Among those who received a letter from Clinton was Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Centre. Rabbi Hier told The CJN that Clinton's reference to a new clemency application by Pollard "has to be viewed positively. Maybe there's a light at the end of the tunnel."

He said he thinks Netanyahu will be "far more aggressive" than Peres in pursuing the Pollard matter with the Americans.

In the letters, Clinton says Pollard "committed a serious crime that posed a threat to our country."

Esther Pollard and others have long argued that Pollard has served more time than anyone else charged with a similar offence and in some cases, more than those caught spying for enemies, not allies, of the United States.

As well, they argue, Pollard's actions caused no lasting damage. "They know," says his wife, "that sooner or later, they will have to release him."

She said her husband's release would "pass without a whisper" from the American public.

Coalition talks hit 'religious snag'

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Negotiations to form a coalition government ran into trouble last week over the demands of the religious parties.

The coalition guidelines were not the only source of difficulty. Portfolio demands and the bickering between the National Religious Party (NRP) and Shas over the Religious Affairs portfolio, as well as increasing unrest inside the Likud, also cast a shadow over the talks.

The lack of progress, however, did not seem to dampen the optimism around Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu. Difficulties, those close to him said, can only be expected in the opening phases of the haggling, when the sides put their toughest positions on the table. The religious parties are sure to get more realistic, they argued.

Sources close to Netanyahu continued to say the coalition would be set up soon and that the new government would be ready for its first vote of confidence when the new Knesset convenes on June 17.

It was noted that Netanyahu has been invited to Washington at the end of the month and it is unlikely he would go before his government is established.

Likud sources said the party's negotiators were quite stunned by the demands presented by the three religious parties. They included returning to the status quo on religious affairs that existed before the Labor victory in 1992, making recognition of all conversions conditional on approval by the Chief Rabbinate, enacting a basic law guaranteeing the Jewish character of the state and guaranteeing that there would be no legislative initiative or adding new coalition partners without the consent of all members of the original coalition.

The Likud negotiators reacted by telling the religious parties they must tone down their aspirations and not press on with demands which they know the Likud cannot meet.

Shlomo Benizri of Shas accused the Likud negotiators of "talking to us insensitively, as if we had asked for things that are above and beyond what could be considered as reasonable."

The NRP's Yitzhak Levy wondered "why the Likud is getting so upset. After all, we asked for nothing much. This is a list of our minimal demands."

Tzahi Hanegbi of Likud noted that "the problem lies in defining the status quo. The religious parties say they cannot agree to freeze things as they now are, because the Labor-Meretz government had altered the status quo adversely, from the religious point of view. They want to go back to the way things were, and agreeing on just where we draw the line is the chief difficulty."

Added pressure on the Likud came from the Third Way, which made its own demands on religious issues, and which underscored that it was also speaking on behalf of Israel b'Aaliyah. These parties demand that no move be made to either amend existing basic laws or enact new ones without their agreement. They also insist on retaining full rights to vote their conscience on religious issues, a situation which, in theory, could deny the coalition a majority when such issues come up in the Knesset.

The Likud also failed to win the support of the religious parties for its portfolio offers. To make peace between Shas and the NRP over the Religious Affairs portfolio, the Likud suggested that they agree to let Ovadia Eli (who lost his Knesset seat) have the portfolio. But the NRP's Shaul Yahalom called this "an attempt by the Likud to usurp this portfolio. We will not agree to this. We will not serve in the government if this portfolio is not in our hands or in the hands of someone on whom we agree."

The Likud also offered the NRP the Education and Communications portfolios, as well as a deputy environment minister. But the NRP wanted Labor and Social Affairs, which was earmarked by the Likud for Shas, along with Interior.

Palestinians soon to declare independent state: Arafat

By JON IMMANUEL and DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM —The Palestinians will soon declare an independent state and no one can stop them, Palestinian Authority (PA) Chairman Yasser Arafat said last week.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak said the establishment of such a state is inevitable, while King Hussein of Jordan said his country would never block the will of the Palestinian people.

The three were speaking at a news conference in the garden of Hussein's winter palace, following a summit to discuss Arab policy in the wake of the Israeli elections.

Through a statement issued by his office, Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu studiously played down Arafat's remark.

"Mr. Netanyahu's position opposing the establishment of a Palestinian state with Jerusalem as its capital is known. The prime minister-elect stresses once again that Israel's position is that Jerusalem will never be divided and will remain united under Israeli sovereignty," the statement said. "Declarations will not change this."

At the news conference, Arafat said: "We are approaching [the time] to declare our independent Palestinian state and its capital in noble Jerusalem. I mean it. This is the desire of the Palestinian people and nobody can stop it."

Mubarak backed Arafat, saying that even if the Likud opposed statehood for the Palestinians, it would not matter.

Hussein added: "The question is the right of the Palestinians on their soil and we are for whatever they decide on. We will never under any conditions be a substitute for them."

Hussein did not directly support a Palestinian state when first asked and spoke only of the inevitability of the peace process. He stated Jordan's position on statehood only after Arafat and Mubarak said a state was unstoppable.

Hussein has been seen by Israel as the most conciliatory of the three leaders most directly involved in talks with Israel. The Likud considers him a key partner in the three-way talks with the PA.

In keeping with Netanyahu's post-election moderate tone, with which he seeks to reassure people at home and abroad of his commitment to the peace process, his statement did not denounce Arafat's remarks but rather said the prime minister-elect "sees things differently" from Arafat on final status talks.

Following the summit, the three Arab leaders issued a joint communique stressing that they would not prejudge the Likud government.

The Likud's hardline positions in opposition could change under the responsibility of government, they said.

Their communique read: "The three leaders dealt with the results of the Israeli elections through an objective evaluation and call on the new Israeli government to continue in the peace process under the fundamentals and principles on which the Madrid conference was based, affirming their conviction that peace is an irreversible strategic choice for all parties in the region."

Netanyahu welcomed the joint communique. "Prime minister-elect Netanyahu believes the comments made at the Akaba summit on advancing a process of peace in the Middle East should be welcomed," his statement read.

Compensation payments expanded

By ALISSA KAPLAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Austrian Fund for Victims of National Socialism has decided that payments from the fund could be inherited if claimants die before receiving their benefits.

The fund's supervisory committee said an application for the fund must have been filed before the claimant's death in order for the money to be inherited.

"It's very important to get the claim in," Elan Steinberg, executive director of the World Jewish Congress, said in an interview last week.

The secretary general of the fund said she expected all the funds to be distributed in three to four years.

The fund was created by the Austrian parliament as a gesture toward victims of the Nazi regime in June 1995.

Steinberg said the decision about inheriting funds set Austria apart from most other countries involved in World War II restitution for Jews.

As of last month, 3,280 claimants had received payments of $7,000 each, for a total payment of about $23 million.

Applicants can contact their local Austrian Consulate or the Austrian Consulate in New York, Attn: Irith Jawetz, 31 E. 69th St., New York, N.Y. 10021. The phone number is 212-737-6400.

MOSCOW – Although election-eve polls show President Boris Yeltsin leading, the Jews in Russia's provinces nonetheless say they fear the prospect of a Communist victory on June 16.

"A Communist victory would have immediate consequences in all spheres of Russian life," says Alexander Sakov, leader of the 15,000-member Jewish community of Omsk in western Siberia.

Those consequences would include immediate restrictions on the activities of the Jewish community, he adds.

Gardening chemicals pose health risk to children

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — What a price to pay for lush lawns and a carpet of green.

With the spring gardening season upon us, consumers are unleashing a varied arsenal of weed and insect killers on their lawns, not aware that these synthetic chemicals can pose a health risk to children and others.

Pesticides have been linked to eye, skin, respiratory and throat irritation while a U.S. National Cancer Institute study showed that children are as much as six times more likely to get childhood leukemia when pesticides are used around the house.

An American Cancer Society (ACS) brochure states that non-Hodgkin's lymphoma may be linked to pesticide exposure while according to a report in the American Journal of Epidemiology, cited by the ACS, more children with brain tumors and other cancers were found to have had exposure to insecticides than children without cancer.

Yet walk into any garden centre, nursery or hardware shop and weekend gardeners are confronted with rows of hazardous chemicals designed to rid your lawn of unwanted weeds and bugs or make it grow like mad.

Of course, you should wear protective work gloves and clothing when you use it, children and pets shouldn't play in the yard after it's been applied and if it comes into contact with your skin or eyes, there are emergency measures spelled out on the label you can take.

A recent item in the New York Times' science section discussed the question of lawn chemicals and found differing opinions on the effects of minute doses on the population. Some scientists say there is no proven correlation between low doses of chemicals and maladies later in life.

But some advocates, who don't buy the minute dose argument, say you don't need to use souped-up chemicals to get a greener lawn anyway.

Janet May, a spokesperson for the Toronto Environmental Alliance (TEA), a non-profit, grassroots organization, says there are natural ways to get an attractive lawn without using chemicals.

One of the no-nos weekend gardeners should avoid is fertilizing their lawns in the spring, she said. The period between Labor Day and Halloween is the right time to fertilize your lawn and you should use only organic long-release compounds, like compost or bone and blood meal.

Fast-growth, synthetic fertilizers can't be totally absorbed by plant-life and are usually washed away and enter the water system. In addition, earthworms, which aerate and fertilize the soil, are killed by synthetic fertilizers, she said.

If you fertilize in the spring you'll encourage shallow root growth — not a good idea prior to Toronto's typically hot and dry summers — and you'll create a hospitable home for beetle grubs, which like underdeveloped roots much more than deeper systems.

Instead of using chemical fertilizers, particularly those that promise fast growth, leave the grass clippings on the lawn during the season and water your grass once a week in the morning with one inch of water. And cut the grass at least three inches high, she recommends.

Not only does that shelter the grass from sun, but it crowds out young crabgrass and dandelion seedlings, which like a lot of light. Instead of using chemical killers like 2,4-D, which was a component of Agent Orange (a Vietnam War defoliant) and which has been linked to non-Hodgkin's lymphoma and prostate cancer, pull the weeds by hand, overseed that area (with perennial rye grass or fescues) and mow your grass taller, May recommends.

The thicker, healthier grass will crowd out the weeds, she said.

Some lawns are dug up and ruined by racoons searching for grubs. One of the chemicals that is commonly used to kill the grubs (and hence, deter racoons) is Diazinon, an organophosphate. The American Cancer Society, quoting the New York State Attorney General, states that chemicals like Diazinon and Dursban "are designed to act as nerve poisons and may cause headaches, dizziness, fatigue, twitching muscles and mental confusion."

You can solve your white grub problem by simply taking one tablespoon of dishwashing detergent and mixing it with water in a typical plant spritzer and spraying your lawn. The soap will kill soft-bodied insects, May said.

TEA believes the key to a healthier lawn is healthier soil and that means avoiding use of chemical agents, which can degrade the soil and make it even more dependent on artificial fertilizers and chemicals.

New drug used on ovarian cancer

As this type of cancer has few symptoms, diagnosing it at an early stage is extremely difficult and it frequently causes death.

Shaare Zedek's Institute of Oncology has recently begun to use Oxaliplatin, a new drug for treating ovarian cancer. It is being used on an experimental basis with a limited number of women, primarily those whose condition has not improved following conventional treatment and those who have suffered relapses after being treated through other methods.

The use of this new medication manufactured by a Swiss pharmaceutical firm is part of a trial being carried out in 20 locations throughout Europe. Shaare Zedek's Unit of Gynecology and Oncology, a member of the European Society for the Prevention of Cancer, is the seventh hospital in the world to begin implementing the treatment.

Preliminary findings of researchers at Shaare Zedek indicate that almost half of the Askkenazi women who have contracted ovarian cancer carried the mutated gene BRCA1, which was recently discovered to cause five to 12 percent of all breast and ovarian cancers. An unexpected finding was that the defective gene is also common among women who had no other case of ovarian cancer in their immediate family.

Prof. Uzi Beller, of the Shaare Zedec Oncology and Surgical Gynecology Unit and a member of the research team, said the findings are important, but added that the incidence of the BRCA1 gene does not at present justify the testing of all Ashkenazi women.

"There are over 100 mutations linked to the genetically transmitted forms of the diseases," he said.

Armed with the information gained from studying the genetic makeup of 25 ovarian cancer patients at Shaare Zedek, some doctors expressed the opinion that, if a first-degree relative of a woman with ovarian cancer is found to have the gene, she should consider having her ovaries removed if she has finished having children and is going into menopause.

As every gene has a certain amount of resistance, not everyone with the gene will get the disease, although the majority will. In the study, the mutation was found among 40 percent of the Ashkenazi patients who did not know of a similar case of the disease in their family.

The team now intends to test the genetic makeup of all their ovarian cancer patients from Ashkenazi backgrounds, along with their relatives, and to carefully watch those women who carry the BRCA1 gene.

Theodore Bikel to play Tevye for 1,600th time

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — "Actually, I was expecting your call an hour later," said Theodore Bikel from his Wisconsin hotel room. Oops. I'd forgotten about the one-hour time difference between Toronto and Green Bay, one of the many cities where the resonant-voiced actor has starred in Fiddler on the Roof.

No matter. With Tevye-like equanimity, he declined my offer to call back, saying, "That's all right. We can do it now."

He even had kind words for my rusty Hebrew, which I used briefly along with French and Yiddish, having read in his autobiography that he always establishes a quick rapport with multilingual people.

Bikel himself speaks at least half a dozen languages and sings in 21, but has played the part of Tevye, which he bases on his memories of his grandfather, only in English.

Born in Vienna, Austria, he fled the Nazis together with his parents and settled as a young teenager in what was then Palestine, eventually becoming an apprentice actor with Habimah, Israel's national theatre company, and a co-founder of the Israel Chamber Theatre.

To hone his skills, he studied at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in London, England. He performed in several West End plays, among them A Streetcar Named Desire with Vivien Leigh, before leaving for the United States in 1954. Now an American citizen, he and his wife have two grown sons.

This week Bikel appears in Fiddler at Montreal's Place des Arts (June 11 to June 16); next week the show comes to Toronto's O'Keefe Centre (June 18 to 23).

When the curtain goes down for the last time in Toronto — the final stop on the 21-month tour, Bikel will have played Tevye 1,600 times. He's been honing the character since 1967 and still waxes enthusiastic about both the "beautifully crafted" play and "such a wonderful role."

Despite his strong identification with Shalom Aleichem's fictional dairyman, Bikel, 72, remains determinedly multi-faceted in his approach to both career and life. "I wear all these different hats — or yarmulkes, if you will."

A renowned folk singer — the song Edelweiss was written especially for him (and his guitar) when he starred in The Sound of Music on Broadway — he has over 20 record albums to his credit, and still performs in concert. He has appeared in some 35 films, including The African Queen and My Fair Lady.

The television generation probably knows him best, however, as Worf's adoptive father, Chief Rozhenko, on Star Trek: The Next Generation. An Emmy award winner and several-time nominee, Bikel has appeared on "virtually every" top dramatic show, according to a news release.

An activist for liberal political and social causes, Bikel marched and sang for civil rights in the South, represented the vocal minority as a delegate at the 1968 Democratic Convention in Chicago and has been a dedicated supporter of Israeli causes. Before his current tour began, he was visiting Israel up to five times a year.

A former president of Actor's Equity, he is currently president of the Associated Actors and Artistes of America (a union umbrella), and is a senior vice-president of the American Jewish Congress. He has served on the board of Amnesty International and was appointed by former U.S. president Jimmy Carter in 1977 to serve a five-year term on the National Council for the Arts.

He has resisted entering politics himself, however. "The commitment [required of a politician] is such that you have to cease to be an actor, possibly cease to be everything else. I can be far more effective this way. I have no self-interest beyond being a good person and a good citizen."

Given Bikel's passion for variety, it's reasonable to wonder whether he tires of repeatedly playing the same stage role. But he says he still finds fresh nuances in the character.

"Some painters paint the same subject over and over again," he mused. "They do that because they love what they do, but each picture is slightly different. It has a different angle to it, a different light."

Eye on Arts

THE SOUND OF NO HANDS CLAPPING

What is the best sort of critical reception to give a newly-published book of revisionist history that exonerates Hitler, minimizes the evil of the Holocaust and knowingly perpetrates other intellectual frauds?

For Michael R. Marrus, the author and professor of European history at the University of Toronto, the answer is simple: no critical reception at all. That is why Marrus recently declined a request from the prestigious New York Times Book Review to review Goebbels: Mastermind of the Third Reich, the controversial biography of master Nazi propagandist Joseph Goebbels by British pseudo-historian David Irving.

"I found the book an extraordinary experience and a compelling read, but it is so repellent in other respects, I would not like to see it (reviewed) under my own imprint," Marrus explained to essayist Tina Rosenberg, who ultimately wrote about the book and the ethical issues it raises in the June 2 edition of the New York Times Book Review.

Rosenberg gave what is perhaps the second-best critical reception to such a book: she clearly exposed its author as a knowing fraud and a purposeful falsifier of facts. For instance: Irving boasts that he was the discoverer of and the first to use Goebbels' complete diaries. Rosenberg showed that he uncovered only about a dozen glass microfiche plates containing previously undiscovered material, a small fraction of the diaries.

"There is little disagreement about Mr. Irving's character," she wrote. "The discussion centres on whether to publish him despite it."

Calling his book a "sophisticated blood libel," Rosenberg compared Irving to another author, Robert W. Thurston, whose recent book, Life and Terror in Stalin's Russia, 1934-1941, reportedly whitewashes the excesses of Stalinism just as neo-Nazi revisionists attempt to do with the Holocaust.

But Rosenberg pointed out a crucial difference between the two authors: "Mr. Thurston may be a bad historian, but at least he is an honest one. David Irving, by contrast, is not just wrong, he appears to be engaging in deliberate distortion."

Irving self-published the book in his native Britain and contracted St. Martin's Press to publish it in the United States. After receiving word of the true nature of Irving and his opus, a senior editor at St. Martin's at first defended both before ultimately deciding not to publish.

Noting that St. Martin's had purchased and was ready to reprint the book without a critical examination of its contents, Rosenberg accused the publishing house of "double negligence."

"Of all the lessons in this story for the American publishing world, the fact that no critic has yet found this behavior remarkable enough to mention should be the most sobering," she concluded.

Rotocode keeps your secrets safe

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A green, light as a feather plastic strip, little larger than a credit card, will revolutionize the security business, claims Gera Roth, 33, inventor of the Rotocode coder.

The coder (retail price $8) will enable businesses to send secret messages that even the KGB and CIA cannot decode, says Roth. It will save executives thousands of dollars otherwise spent on guarding the privacy of phone lines or mail with expensive anti-spy equipment, he contends. "It is versatile, simple and 100 percent secure," he said.

The Rotocode, which can be assembled in three minutes, is a card which will spell out messages when it is decoded according to a secret, seven-digit program number known only to the sender and receiver.

"The scanning (sending) and decoding of the message can be done in seconds," said Roth. "The Rotocode can be sent by fax or e-mail."

He has patented it in the United States, and Canadian and international patents are pending.

A Jewish immigrant who is now a Canadian citizen, Roth said he remembers a simple paper version of the coder from his school days in Russia. "It's possible that the secrecy needed in Iron Curtain countries to safeguard privacy encouraged people to look for ways of coding secret messages," he said. "But the basic idea was patented in the United States by a military man but it couldn't be adopted for mass use."

About four years ago Roth hit on the way to do this with plastic cards and dots which are made partly in the United States and Canada.

The beauty of the Rotocode is that the secret program number can be changed in seconds for both the sender and receiver.

A businessman who is secretly negotiating to acquire a competitor is a good candidate for the Rotocode if he wants to keep the information from falling into the wrong hands, Roth said.

He expects it will be a good educational tool and already some Boy Scout stores in Buffalo (his first sale) are stocking it. He is canvassing schools, embassies and consulates, and anticipates that teenagers will be a good market.

Call 416-635-2778 for a list of stores in Toronto and Mississauga which stock the Rotocode or fax 416-789-9828 for information.

Klezmer Band thrills crowd

TORONTO — The aisles of the Weston Recital Hall at the Ford Centre were jumping last week with dancers responding to the irrestible rhythms emanating from the Klezmer Conservatory Band on stage.

Something in the wailing, insistent music turned on an otherwise staid audience attending a gala sponsored by Beit Halochem, which gives aid to disabled Israeli veterans.

In no number was the consummate professionalism of these 11 musicians more evident than in their version of And the Angels Sing. In a seamless way, cornet and trombone buttressed the sweeter sounds of the clarinet and violin in this jazz favorite descended from klezmer music.

Leader Hankus Netsky and vocalist Judy Bressler wandered on and off the stage but the other players carried on as if the music is as natural to them as breathing. What appears on the surface as a deceptively simple improvisation is in reality a tightly disciplined group that never misses a note.

Perhaps because he was a small man playing a small banjo and a small mandolin, Jeff Warschauer was a crowd favorite, as were bare-armed clarinetist Ilene Stahl, front and centre, along with Miriam Rabson and her toothpick sized violin.

"We play classical music as well as klezmer but we do it on our own terms," said Netsky, introducing the wildly frenetic Frelich Fantastik, with apologies to Beethoven, Rubenstein, Grieg and Mendlessohn.

Ten Israeli veterans in the front row received a standing ovation of several minutes. The audience was greeted by Jehudi Kinar, Israel consul general, who spoke warmly of the help given to 44,000 Israeli war veterans by Beit Halochem.

Michael Sax, Beit Halochem president, said four centres have been set up in Israel for the veterans. Michael Kalmar and Ralph Snow were co-chairs of the concert. — B.R.

Jews have played a major role in NBA's history

By NEIL KELLER
Special to The CJN

ROCKVILLE, Md. — Ever since the NBA was founded in 1946, at least one Jewish athlete has played in the league every season, but that "streak" was in jeopardy until Danny Schayes was signed by the Miami Heat in December.

The son of the legendary player and coach Dolph Schayes, Danny was selected in the first round of the 1981 draft by the Utah Jazz. The six-foot-11 centre's best year was in 1987-88 when he averaged 13.9 points per game for the Denver Nuggets.

While Schayes is currently the only Jewish player in the world's premier league, Jewish stars played major roles in basketball prior to World War II and in the NBA's formative years.

In its first season (1946-47), the premier Jewish player in the NBA was Max Zaslofsky. The six-foot-two forward's career included stints with the Chicago Stags and the New York Knicks, among other teams. He led the league in scoring in the 1947-48 season, averaging 21 points per game. In the 1949-50 campaign he was tops in free throw percentage.

When he retired in 1956, he was the third all-time scorer in NBA history.

Sidney Hertzberg led the Knicks in scoring during the NBA's first season with 8.7 points per game. Among his Knick teammates were Jewish cagers Oscar Schechtman, Leo Gottlieb, Ralph Kaplowitz and Henry Rosenstein. Jerome Fleishman, Mel Hirsch, Art Spector and Sid Tannenbaum were among the many other Jewish players who played in the NBA in its early years.

Red Holzman, an All-American guard at CCNY, played with the Rochester Royals beginning in the 1945-46 season. At the time, the Royals played in the National League (NL), a rival professional circuit.

In 1948, the Royals joined the NBA and Holzman continued his successful career as the 1950-51 Royals won the league title. Holzman stayed with the Royals until 1953. In his last season, 1953-54, he served as player-coach for the Milwaukee Hawks.

Holzman went on to become one of the NBA's most successful coaches. In 1970, he was named the Coach of the Year and he was later inducted into the Pro Basketball Hall of Fame.

Bronx native Dolph Schayes, the greatest Jewish basketball player ever, started his professional career in 1948 with the NL's Syracuse Nationals, one year before the team moved to the NBA. Schayes, six foot eight, 220 pounds, was an instant success and was selected NBA Rookie of the Year for the 1949-50 season.

Considered one of the NBA's most dominant players of the 1950s, Schayes was named to the All-NBA team 12 times. He averaged more than 18 points per game during his career and retired as the NBA's all-time leading scorer with 19,249 points.

Schayes coached the 76ers for three seasons and was named the Coach of the Year in 1965-66 when they won the NBA championship. Schayes is in the Pro Basketball Hall of Fame as well as a member of the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Israel.

Standing two inches taller than Schayes, Harry Boykoff began his NBA playing days in 1949. He averaged 10.7 points per game during his career in the NBA and NL.

Another good player during that era was Ed Miller. The six-foot-eight player averaged more than 10 points per game in his two seasons in the NBA.

In 1957, Lennie Rosenbluth was being touted as an emerging superstar after being named 1957 College Player of the Year while starring for the Tar Heels of North Carolina.

The Philadelphia Warriors selected Rosenbluth in the first round but the six-foot-four player never measured up to the hype or fans' expectations. In his one season, he averaged a disappointing 4.4 points per game.

Rudy LaRusso played forward in the NBA from 1959-69. The six-foot eight, 225-pounder was selected by the Los Angeles Lakers and averaged 13.7 points per game in his rookie season.

He scored 50 points in one game and was selected to participate in the 1962-63 all-star game. His best season was in 1967-68 when he averaged 21.8 points per game for the San Francisco Warriors. In his last season he still averaged more than 20 points per game.

Art Heyman was a dominating player for the Duke Devils in the early 1960s and in 1963, he was named College Player of the Year. In the next year's NBA draft, Heyman was the number one pick, taken by the Knicks.

Heyman averaged more than 15 points per game in his rookie season. He played in the NBA from 1963-66 and then a further three seasons in the ABA.

The early 1960s also saw two-time All-American Barry Kramer make his mark. In 1963 Kramer averaged over 29 points per game at NYU and he made his NBA debut during the 1964-65 season. He later played one season in the ABA. Unfortunately, the six-foot-four hoopster was not the prolific scorer in the pro leagues that he was in college.

Larry Brown never played in the NBA but was outstanding in the ABA from 1967-72.

The five-foot-nine player was an excellent ball handler who led the ABA in assists during his first three seasons. A three-time ABA all-star, Brown went on to coach at various levels. He is now the head coach of the Indiana Pacers.

The tallest Jewish player ever to play pro basketball is believed to be Dave Newmark. Standing over seven feet tall, Newmark was a centre in the NBA from 1968-70.

A year after Newmark's arrival, six-foot-10 centre Neal Walk was recruited out of the University of Florida, chosen second in the college draft, right behind Lew Alcindor. Alcindor later changed his name to the more familiar Kareem Abdul Jabbar and went on to become the NBA's all-time leading scorer.

Walk played for the Phoenix Suns for most of his career. The 1972-73 season was his best as he averaged 20.2 points per game and hauled down more than 1,000 rebounds. He finished his career after the 1976-77 season playing for the Knicks.

Lizzies dinner planned

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Fifty years ago, Bob Abate closed out his legendary career as a coach of the Lizzies boys sports teams with four championships.

Next week on June 17, the alumni of those four teams will be honored at the annual Lizzies Oldtimers Dinner at the Bob Abate Recreation and Community Centre, 485 Montrose at Bloor.

About 125 to 150 people are expected to attend the annual event that will pay tribute to the 1946 juvenile basketball and juvenile hardball teams, the junior softball team and the midget hardball team, said Howard Garfield, president of the Lizzies Oldtimers Association.

They will also reminisce about days gone by and remember their late coach and mentor, Bob Abate.

Abate, who ran the famed playground at Central Tech for many years in the 1930s and '40s, won 150 city, provincial and national titles in basketball, hardball and softball. He was inducted into the Canadian Sports Hall of Fame in 1976, but more important than his excellence as a coach was that "he was a moulder of men," Garfield said.

Keynote speaker at the dinner will be Jocko Thomas, the former crime reporter for the Toronto Star. Tickets are $35 and can be obtained by calling Norm Cornack at 416-749-6735 or Harvey Bronstine at 905-886-6580.

1 tblsp vegetable oil
1 onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 tblsp minced fresh ginger root
1 cup (2 med.) finely diced carrots
1 cup finely diced green cabbage
1/4 cup chicken stock
2 cups bean sprouts
1/3 to 1/2 cup bottled Szechuan peanut sauce
1/4 cup chopped fresh coriander

Place individual wrappers in microwavable muffin pan or custard cups to form cups. Microwave, uncovered 6 cups at a time, at High for 1 to 1 1/2 mins. or until wrappers are opaque and light-brown in colour (check underside). Remove cups immediately to wire rack to cool and crisp. Dry moisture from muffin pan and continue with remaining wrappers. If making ahead, store in airtight container at room temperature.

In large frypan, heat oil over med.-high heat. Add onion, garlic and ginger and stir-fry for a few mins. until onion is softened. Add carrots, cabbage and chicken stock, cook, uncovered until tender-crisp about 5 mins., stirring often. Add bean sprouts and peanut sauce, stirring a few mins. until heated through. Remove from heat, stir in coriander. Cool mixture slightly and spoon into wonton cups. Serve immediately. Makes 18-20 appetizers. Recipe courtesy of Foodland Ontario.

About families

Dear Susan,

We are in the process of planning our annual summer family vacation. Each year we travel to New England and rent a cottage for two weeks. We just received confirmation on the rental of an incredible three-bedroom cottage. It has all the features that we desire, all but a television. Secretly, I cheered, NO TV - we can draw, read, walk, play board games and talk.

We shared the good news with our children. Our 11-year-old son responded by suggesting that we might consider renting a TV for rainy days. Our 7-year-old daughter thought that we might purchase a hi-tech microchip mini TV, so we could all take turns watching our favorite program.

What do you think, is a TV a must?

Dear Susan,

Your children must be complimented on the logical, non-confrontational way in which they have presented the case for television. Your son has managed to approach the issue by presenting you with a rational argument for having a television present during the vacation, and your daughter contributes to the case by letting you know how easy it would be to meet every family member's television needs. They have elected to be logical and reasonable rather than demanding and arbitrary, and you must be sure to respond in kind.

Ultimately, the decision will have to be made based on your assessment of whether or not television will add to or diminish your vacation experience..A key benefit of a vacation is that it provides family members with quality time with each other, unencumbered by work or other distractions, the family has the time and space to interact in a meaningful manner. If you are using the TV as your main avenue of entertainment, or as an escape from family interaction, it will detract from the vacation. However, television can actually have a therapeutic value if used as a time out, particularly for hyperactive or hypoactive children and adults.

Having a TV or not can be either a parental decision or family decision depending on your family style of decision making. However the decision is made, you must be sure the ultimate reasons are articulated in the same rational spirit as was the argument presented by the children. Given the obvious intellection gifts that your children possess you may want to challenge them to see how many days they can cope without TV.

By LEORA EREN-FRUCHT
CJN Israel Correspondent

JERUSALEM — As the 14th Knesset opened this past Monday, with the swearing in of 120 MKs – 40 of them new – Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu was working feverishly to put together a government.

When The CJN went to press, Netanyahu had signed coalition agreements with the National Religious Party (NRP), Shas, the Third Way, United Torah Judaism (UTJ) and Israel b'Aliyah.

Meanwhile the Likud leader made last minute changes, in order to keep peace within his own party. Many Likud MKs were shocked and angry at Netanyahu's decision earlier this week to leave party giants like Ariel Sharon, Dan Meridor, Benny Begin and Moshe Katzav out of the government.

Netanyahu had chosen unelected professionals to fill two important posts: the coveted Finance Ministry was offered to Bank of Israel governor Yaacov Frenkel, while the Justice Ministry was given to attorney Yaacov Ne'eman. The outrage in Likud led Netanyahu to renege and offer the Finance Ministry to Meridor, and other portfolios to the remaining three.

Sharon, who was hoping to get either Finance or Defence, reluctantly accepted the Housing Ministry after turning it down once. However, by the time Sharon accepted, the portfolio had already been promised to United Torah Judaism.

While Sharon's position was still unclear on Monday, the government-in-formation was already taking shape with the following appointments: David Levy, foreign minister; Yitzhak Mordechai, Defence; Katzav, Communications and deputy prime minister; Begin, Science and Technology; Rafael Eitan, Agriculture and Environment – all Likud members.

The Education Ministry will go to Zevulun Hammer (NRP); the Interior Ministry to Eli Suissa (Shas); and Religious Affairs will be split on a rotating basis between the two.

Transportation and Energy will be held by Yitzhak Levy (NRP); Labor and Social Affairs by Eli Yishai (Shas); and Internal Security by Avigdor Kahalani (The Third Way). The Justice Ministry appeared slated to go to the unelected and unaffiliated Ne'eman.

The Ministry of Industry and Trade will go to Sharansky, and an expanded Immigration and Absorption Ministry will go to Yuli Edelstein – both of Israel b'Aliyah.

The remaining ministries – Tourism and Health – were being held for prominent Likud MKs, including the only potential woman in the government – Limor Livnat.

UTJ will get the deputy ministry in Housing as well as the chair of the powerful Knesset finance committee.

Military pact reaffirmed

By SUZAN N. TARABLUS
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ISTANBUL — A much publicized two-day visit here by Israeli President Ezer Weizman has given a new prominence to the growing ties between Israel and Turkey.

During a meeting with Weizman last week, Turkish President Suleyman Demirel vowed that Ankara would not cancel the military pact that the two countries signed in February, Weizman later told a group of Turkish businesspeople.

He said Demirel had told him that "no one will tell Israel and Turkey what to do."

Demirel's comments regarding the pact, as related by Weizman, came only days after the leaders of Syria, Saudi Arabia and Egypt urged Turkey to cancel it.

"The agreement will not be cancelled and it will continue without interruption," Weizman reportedly told the group.

Details of the pact officially remain secret, but according to a copy of the agreement leaked this week, it calls for the two countries to expand military cooperation by land and sea over a five-year period.

Egypt, which signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1979, has been among the most vocal opponents of the accord in the Arab world, expressing reservations about whether it would disturb the regional balance of power.

Weizman said during his visit here that Israel is not interested in posing any kind of threat to other Arab countries in the region through its developing ties with Turkey.

In a related development, Israel Aircraft Industries was reportedly close to completing a $600-million deal to upgrade the Turkish air force's fleet of American built F-4 Phantom jets. The agreement was reached last year, but was delayed as Turkey sought financing from Israeli financial institutions.

The future of the military accord nonetheless remains unclear, given the ongoing negotiations here to form a new coalition government that may be led by the pro-Islamic Welfare Movement.

According to a 1993 High Court ruling, no one under indictment can serve as a minister.

WASHINGTON – A record number of Republicans and Democrats in the House of Representatives joined forces this week to approve an $11.9-billion foreign aid bill that maintains Israel's current $3 billion in assistance.

The measure, which passed 366 to 57, also includes $2.1 billion for Egypt and $590 million to the republics of the former Soviet Union, including Russia.

Netanyahu Postpones U.S. Trip

JERUSALEM – As Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu's chances of forming a coalition before a self-imposed deadline waned, his office announced that he would not travel to the United States until mid-July.

Netanyahu had been tentatively scheduled to go to Washington at the end of this month.

The June trip was scheduled on the assumption that he would put together his new government by June 17, the first day of the Knesset session.

Netanyahu's office said he wanted more time to prepare for the trip.

Protesters object to restart of Auschwitz mall

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Chanting, "Tear down the mall," about 45 demonstrators gathered outside the Polish consulate on Lakeshore Boulevard last week to protest the resumption of construction of a shopping centre near the Auschwitz death camp.

Several weeks ago, after a similar protest at the same location, assurances were given by the Polish Consulate that construction of the mall would be brought to an end. Yet media reports indicate work on the mall has resumed, Sheen said.

"We're going to stop singing and start swinging. Enough's enough," Sheen said as he called for action from Polish authorities and not merely promises.

Sheen launched into a bitter denunciation of Polish authorities and local Polish newspapers after grabbing a megaphone from the hands of Nathan Leipciger, co-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Holocaust Remembrance Committee. Leipciger had just said consular officials assured him that construction had again been stopped in accordance with Polish legal process.

Grabbing the megaphone, Sheen said Jews had suffered many provocations at Auschwitz: a 30-foot cross had been erected ("to pretend there were no Jews murdered there"); neo-Nazi skinheads had been allowed to march in the camp (in support of the mall); a plaque had been erected in the camp to honor a Polish resistance group that conducted anti-Semitic attacks; and the mall was built near the site of the mass murder of Jews.

Assurances by Polish authorities that they would stop construction of the mall are merely "a delaying tactic," he said.

Earlier, Frank Dimant of B'nai Brith Canada addressed the protesters, asking, "Who in their right mind would want to shop in a place where more than one million people were murdered and tortured? ... The Polish government has the responsibility to stop the building of the mall."

One of the protesters present, Sigmund Sobolewski, a Polish-Catholic survivor of Auschwitz who has campaigned tirelessly against the mall, said the situation in Poland is complicated by a clash of wills between local and regional/national politicians.

Polish federal and regional officials are trying to stop the mall, but they're being stymied by local officials and the mall developers, he said. The local people are promoting the mall, not just to make money, but more to provoke the world Jewish community, he suggested.

When Jews react with outrage to the mall and call for its demise, "they say the Jews are trying to provoke us" and interfere in Polish affairs, Sobolewski said.

Leipciger agreed that local Auschwitz officials "are pushing for the construction, and the provincial and federal [governments] are trying to stop it."

Sobolewksi, who was recently profiled in a documentary aired on TVOntario, said Auschwitz Museum authorities are acting in bad faith when it comes to Jewish concerns. They allowed a unilingual Polish plaque to be placed in the wall at Block 15 honoring the AK, a nationalist army one segment of which, the NSZ, "instead of fighting Germans, killed and hunted Jewish partisans.

But "we delivered a plaque to honor the heroic Jews of the sonderkommando [who blew up the gas chambers and crematoria in late 1944] six years ago. It's still lying in a basement." Museum officials say they cannot use it as it's in English only, he said.

Meanwhile, an elderly neighbor of the Polish consulate who took an interest in the protest told The CJN she was appalled by the construction of the mall. "To desecrate graves, that brings a curse," she said.

As flowers to a meadow, sunlight in the morning, or the glimpse of an angel in the smile of a young child, education has always been at the very core of Jewish life. It has been thus ever since Moses enjoined our forebears more than 3,500 years ago to "teach God's ways diligently to your children."

This is not ethnocentric hyperbole or religious boosterism; it is a statement of historical fact acknowledged by Jew and non-Jew alike. For example, in Outline of History, published in 1920, H.G. Wells wrote: "The Jewish religion, because it was a literature-sustained religion, led to the first efforts to provide elementary education for all the children in the community."

In modern times, at least since the emancipation in the mid-19th century, we and our children are increasingly distracted away from the ocean-deep richness of Jewish life, learning and culture. To counter such distraction, comprehensive, formal, intensive Jewish education has become more necessary than ever. Ironically though, and sadly, it is less experienced than ever. The risk to the Jewish people is not imaginary. As Mordecai Kaplan, the eminent theologian and educator, wisely pointed out, "Where Jewish education is neglected, the whole content of Judaism is reduced to merely an awareness of anti-Semitism. Judaism ceases then to be a civilization; and becomes, instead, a complex." This, of course, is the nub of the debate on "continuity."

The Board of Jewish Education (BJE), an agency of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, is dedicated to preserving, enriching and promoting the quality of Jewish education in Greater Toronto's affiliated Jewish schools. It is a resource of pedagogical experts, advisors and administrators, which in a variety of ways assists these schools to educate the 15,000 children receiving some form of Jewish education in greater Toronto.

Last autumn, it sponsored a creative writing contest for all children in BJE-affiliated schools in grades 1 to 8. Children were invited to submit works of prose, poetry or drama, fiction or non-fiction, on any of 21 different topics.

In response, the BJE received almost 350 entries in Hebrew and in English from students attending nine day schools, high schools and supplementary schools. Thirty entries were selected as winners. An additional nine were selected as honorable mentions.

It is the pleasure and unique delight of The CJN to reproduce some of the winning poems. Unfortunately, space does not allow us to publish more than five.

When the Messiah Comes

When the Messiah comes
A white horse gleaming in the sunlight
A prince in gold with diamond buttons
Erect, he sits, the people in awe bow down in reverence
Smiles, happy faces, merriment all around
Joyous voices rise to the heavens,
"The Messiah has come, the Messiah has come."
A child's fantasy.

When the Messiah comes
Children rise for elders
Fear, jealousy and worry vanish
Peace and harmony fill the Earth
Blood, rape and war in shame hide their ugly faces
A man's hope.

When the Messiah comes
A little bread and water
A roof on one's head
A friendly smile, and good morning from a neighbor
The Talmud on the table, with a little candlelight
Quiet and tranquility
An old man's dream.

The Masks of Purim

Once upon a time in an old city,
There lived a poor beggar, and a rich man, quite greedy.

Although they lived on the same block,
A meeting with each other was never a thought.

The rich man, oh yes, honored quite so,
While the poor man, instead, no one did know.

Said the rich man to his servants,
"Find a costume to hide who I am."

His servants went out searching, that very day,
And our very own beggar happened to come their way.

"Look," said one servant, "I have an 'idear,' Let's dress up our master like the beggar right here."

After Megillah reading, when the people looked around,
What caught their eye was a strange beggar on the ground.

They laughed and they mocked him, and made him feel bad,
And our rich man, as beggar, began to feel sad.

The rich man started thinking, "So this is how one feels!

This all wouldn't have happened, if our rich man hadn't disguised himself then,
On that old memorable Purim, of 1910.

And our poor beggar, well, what could we say?
He thanks HaShem for "v'nahaphoch hu" every day.

After Shabbat meal
Playing games and having fun
No rushing here, no rushing there
Because the week is done.

And when the night is over
We know tomorrow will be fun
It is the day God rested
And said his work was done.

My Jerusalem: Jerusalem for All Time

Jerusalem is far more than just a place
It is also a dream – dreamt for the past two thousand years.
Sometimes, even as you stand erect in her golden streets
You still long for her.

You long for her walls, so tall and high,
Her antiquity of three thousand years,
Her everlasting beauty, that will remain for all of time.

As long as the world has a soul,
Jerusalem will remain a city of divinity for all time.
For all time.

by Adam Hirsh and Jack Latner, Grade 8

My Jerusalem: This Old Man

He's standing there at my side,
His wrinkled skin – so soft,
People flock towards him
As he holds his head aloft.

He's old and yet his back is straight,
He's lived through many woes.
Still plenty are his happy times
In the land where honey flows.

All his life, he's been the shoulder
Upon which others sigh.
He's wiped the tears of plaintive faces
His grandchildren – they cry.

Happy people bring their joy,
Of those well and those wed.
They tell of babies and good fortune –
"A blessing on your head!"

He's living a life of many years
All on Jerusalem's soil,
Swaying palm trees decorating
The City of the Royal.

Stone houses spot the hillside,
Streets graced with young and old,
City of such holiness –
Oh Jerusalem of Gold.

And who is this illustrious man
Of whom the praise is told?
The Kotel Hama'aravi of JERUSALEM OF GOLD.

Former Rabin aide to visit

TORONTO — The man who showed the world the bloodstained songsheet taken from Yitzhak Rabin's breast pocket following his assassination will address a Toronto audience on June 27.

Eitan Haber, who served as Rabin's aide for 37 years, will be here for the Canadian Friends of Tel Hashomer Hospital's annual event, at the Leah Posluns Theatre beginning at 8 p.m.

It was Haber who announced to the world media that Rabin had been killed by an assassin's bullets.

Haber also organized Rabin's funeral on Mount Herzl.

He will share his personal experiences and provide insights into Rabin's career, according to a statement from the Canadian Friends.

Haber first met Rabin in 1958 and served under his command. In 1985, when Rabin was made Defence Minister, he appointed Haber as adviser in the ministry.

When Rabin became prime minister, he made Haber an adviser and director of his office, a position Haber held for three years.

Haber wrote most of Rabin's speeches, most notably those delivered at Israel's peace signing ceremonies.

Noted journalist

He directed the political section of the Prime Minister's Office and helped organize the ceremony at Arava marking the peace agreement between Israel and Jordan.

That prompted The Washington Post to remark that "what President Clinton needs at the White House now in order to succeed is Eitan Haber of Israel."

For 26 years, Haber was also a noted journalist, serving as senior writer and commentator on military matters for the daily newspaper, Yediot Ahronot. He wrote a series of bestselling books in Israel on the peace process, the Mossad, the Entebbe rescue and a biography of former prime minister Menachem Begin.

The volunteer-run Canadian Friends raises funds for the purchase of medical equipment for Tel Hashomer Hospital, a civilian and military facility near Tel Aviv known in Israel as the "soldier's hospital." It was founded in 1948.

Since the founding of the Canadian Friends 11 years ago, the group has raised over $1.5 million toward the purchase of incubators for premature babies, hi-tech lasers, arthroscopic equipment and the endowment of a chair in nuclear medicine.

This Caravan stops at Jerusalem pavilion

By FRANCES KRAFT

TORONTO — There's falafel, a camel and even a shuk (Hebrew for market). So what if the camel isn't real and the high temperatures are the result of the crowds at the Bloor JCC, not the Mediterranean sun?

The idea at Caravan, Toronto's multicultural festival being held this week (June 15 to 22), is to get a taste of other countries, both figuratively and literally.

At the Jerusalem pavilion, sponsored by B'nai Brith Canada since 1980 at the same Bloor-Spadina location, visitors can sip Goldstar (non-alcoholic Israeli beer) and sample hummus or eggplant salad with pita while enjoying Israeli music and dancing. For dessert, honey-drenched baklava provides a powerful sugar fix.

A Mediterranean-style hot dog-and-hamburger menu is available at the pavilion's rooftop cafe, where keyboardist Darren Kagal and singers Maytal Golan and Limore Twena are featured entertainers. The kosher food is supplied by Levy's Catering.

On display at the pavilion is artwork by students from Associated Hebrew Day Schools, Bialik Hebrew Day School, the Downtown Jewish Community School, Leo Baeck Day School and United Synagogue Day School, as well as by senior students from the Bernard Betel Centre.

As in years past, entertainment is provided in the main auditorium by the award-winning Jerusalem Dancers, choreographed by Rivka Atzmony, and the Neimot singers under musical director Doron Ophir.

To celebrate Jerusalem 3000, this year's show features excerpts from Our Jerusalem, a musical about the city's history presented earlier this year as a joint project of the Jewish National Fund of Toronto and the Canadian Zionist Federation. The performers are all Toronto teenagers.

Another local teen, Jerusalem-born high school student Keren Menashe, is on hand as pavilion princess. "This wonderful city is the centre of the world. It holds great value for the world's three largest religions," said Menashe at last week's preview night.

"We have always yearned for Jerusalem, the central focal point of Jewish existence," said Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

This year's pavilion mayor, Gerald Potasky, called the pavilion "a labor of love" for B'nai Brith.

Three war crimes cases must continue: lawyer

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A letter from a senior Justice Department official to the Chief Justice of the Federal Court was inappropriate and misguided, but it shouldn't spell the end of a case involving three men linked to Nazi war crimes, Justice Department lawyer Christopher Amerasinghe argued last week.

In determining whether to grant a request for a stay of proceedings, the court must balance the appearance of bias with the societal interest in seeing the cases proceed, Amerasinghe said.

Furthermore, it would be going too far to suggest that all the judges of the Federal Court be disqualified from hearing the cases, he contended.

Amerasinghe was responding to arguments placed before Federal Court Justice Bud Cullen by lawyers for Johann Duecke, Helmut Oberlander and Erichs Tobiass, three men who allegedly participated in Nazi war crimes. The government is attempting to strip them of their citizenship and deport them.

Their lawyers have sought a stay of proceedings because of a letter from Ted Thompson, assistant deputy minister of justice, to Chief Justice Julius Isaac. Isaac subsequently met with trial judge James Jerome. The letter and the meeting create the apprehension of bias and are an abuse of process, the lawyers contend.

"There is nothing in the letter that even hints at the merits of the cases [or] that there should be some partiality towards the government." There is no indication the three men would not receive a fair trial and there is no evidence that other judges of the Federal Court would be biased in the case, Amerasinghe said.

Responding to Amerasinghe's arguments, Bayne said society's interest rested in not permitting cases to proceed where the judiciary's independence had been thrown into question.

Earlier, lawyers for the three alleged war criminals sought to introduce new evidence about the circumstances surrounding Thompson's letter to Isaac. They pointed to a news statement released on May 23 by Isaac that stated he met with Thompson "at my request ... to discuss the handling in a timely way of a number of citizenship cases." Earlier reports indicated Thompson approached Isaac first.

Cullen called the news release "particularly unhelpful ... The nicest way I can put this [is that] this press release should never have been written."

Cullen said, however, that for the purpose of determining the issue of the stay, who approached whom was irrelevent.

David Levy set to address gala dinner for Or Haemet

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A gala dinner with plenty of Moroccan atmosphere will celebrate the long-awaited building of a permanent home for Or Haemet Sephardic School.

The event, complete with Moroccan menu and live oriental music, will be held on June 24 at Le Parc Banquet Halls in Thornhill.

David Levy, former Israeli deputy prime minister and foreign minister, who is likely to hold the same positions in the new cabinet, is scheduled as keynote speaker.

His address will be in Hebrew and simultaneous translation will be provided. Rabbi Rafael Abuhatzira, grandson of the Baba Sali, will also speak.

Over 400 people are expected to attend the $180-a-plate dinner. Henry Abittan and his Montreal-based band will play Moroccan music.

"The school is the future of our community," says Rabbi Amram Assayag, spiritual leader of Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation and educational consultant of Or Haemet.

Established in 1975 in the basement of Petah Tikva, Or Haemet has been situated in rented premises at Adath Israel Congregation for the past 15 years. Over 200 students attend the school, which is affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education.

Construction of the new 80,000-square-foot building, located on a three-acre site on Bathurst Street just north of Steeles Avenue, is well under way. There will be 30 classrooms serving children from nursery through Grade 8.

Approximately half of the $10 million needed for the building and furnishings has been raised.

The school/community centre is expected to open in September and will house not only Or Haemet, but also a synagogue, mikvah, gymnasium, banquet hall and swimming pool.

It will also be the home of the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario, formed earlier this year, and its Medrash Torah Vehayim for adult Torah education classes.

"It will be a building that will be full of life," says Rabbi Assayag.

An assurance not kept

The government of Quebec last week tabled amendments to the French Language Charter the effect of which, among others, brings back to life the Commission de protection de la langue française which former premier Robert Bourassa abolished.

We understand and share Quebecers' concerns for protecting the French language against the incursions of global, cultural, commercial, and technological forces. Preserving and enhancing the culture, traditions and beauty of the French language is one of our society's chief objectives. Though this is, obviously, of primary importance for Quebecers, it is equally so for all Canadians. But, as we have previously written in this space, we believe that Quebecers and Canadians can best achieve the objective from the base of a strong, assertive, officially bilingual federal state. We therefore regret the decision by the government of Quebec opting to revive the commission.

The initiative by the government was widely viewed as a concession by Premier Lucien Bouchard to the hard-liners within the Parti Québécois. But its timing could not have been worse. The minorities of Quebec have not yet "relaxed" since the referendum. The post-referendum was too great a trauma. And events, rhetoric and political posturing since then, simply won't let them. There is an "edginess," a nervousness among the minorities palpable in their homes, on the streets, in the cafes, in the pubs and in the meeting halls. The language law amendments add to it. They make the present climate more stormy, rather than calm it down.

Opponents of the changes have already indicated that they will challenge them in court. The cycle of measure and counter-measure will spiral upward, accompanied inevitably on both sides by careless accusations and wounding rhetoric. Mutual trust will erode further.

When Bouchard recently spoke to the financial establishment in New York , he assured them that his government would direct its efforts to the economy and not to the politics of separation. How can the decision to bring back the "language police," as the commission is so tellingly, so poignantly referred to within the non-francophone minorities, be reconciled with that assurance? It cannot be.

Several years ago, she claimed that Adolf Hitler "was good at the beginning, but he went too far." This was just the tip of the iceberg of her shocking indiscretion. Not long afterward, fans learned that she had made vicious, racially-charged slurs about African Americans as well as Jews. Suspended for the 1993 season and fined $25,000 for bringing "disrepute and embarrassment" to the game, Schott seemed chastened by the humiliation of being asked to step aside.

Thankfully, we did not hear from her for two years. However, in an interview broadcast throughout the United States last month, Schott amazingly enough, repeated the tendentious phrase about Hitler which landed her in hot water in the first place. Following an outcry, Schott abjectly apologized for her empty-headed remark, but it was too late.

Last week, in a wise decision, baseball's powers-that-be forced her to give up control of the Reds through 1998. Schott disgraces the game of baseball. Anyone who defames minorities has no place in the counsels of a major sport like baseball. And someone who claims that Hitler was initially a positive force misreads and distorts history. Evidently, Schott cannot understand that her revision of history is intellectually and morally outrageous and simply unacceptable in public life today. In the interests of decency and of the integrity of baseball, her suspension should be made permanent. S.K.

Girl in interracial family angry at story

Weeks after your publication of the article about interracial adoption in the Jewish community, where our family picture was on the front page, I still feel that I must comment on it. Though Ron Csillag did a commendable job of researching the issues around adoption, our personal story was inaccurate and much of the positive information on the subject was omitted. This was a disservice to the many supportive members of our community as well as to those in other cities where we have lived.

The Orthodox community has come a long way in the past 15 years, granted somewhat more slowly than "the world at large," but still it has progressed. As a highly visible clergy family, we check on "community acceptance" before we move. Our move to Ottawa has been extremely positive. Our synagogue has been warm and loving to us. Our children's schools, Maimonides and Yitzhak Rabin, have been caring, accepting and supportive. Temple Israel, where I work, has also made us very welcome.

It is also true that people do stare at us (since we look like a miniature United Nations); however, most of the time it is the type of staring people do when trying to understand and assimilate what they are seeing. This is part of life and not necessarily negative.

Our "Toronto experience" was unpleasant for two of our children who went to shul (without the rest of our family) along with our friends' children; there, they felt stared at or ignored, and were left to play by themselves. They were sure it was a racial issue. I was most upset by this, since the children of that shul are largely educated in Orthodox day schools where the mitzvah of "welcoming guests and strangers" is taught. Apparently, people there are not "walking their talk." I am sorry we were not there to help our children and enlighten the congregation.

This article had the potential to enlighten and educate our people about accepting other Jews. In order to do that, a more balanced picture is necessary. True, these incidents occur, not only in Toronto, but in my hometown of Cleveland, too. But it is heartwarming to see the growth and changes people have made in their ability to accept "differences." Many people have said, "Yasher koach," or "Your family is wonderful." People considering interracial adoption need to understand the challenges they will face and the tremendous joy they will reap.

Our second daughter was very angry about the article and she was the impetus for my writing to you.

She wasn't in Toronto when this incident occurred and feels that no one has ever been mean to her because she's different and it is wrong to say otherwise. From the mouths of babes ... It is my hope that the positive elements of raising a very unique, wonderful, G-d-given family shine through the few clouds that may come our way.

There is diversity among men and women

In "Book of Ruth Speaks to Women" (May 16), Rachel Turkienicz writes that "Job responds to the loss of his children with a male response — the reason must lie in the world at large. Naomi responds to the loss of her children by internalizing the blame — she holds herself responsible. Women throughout time have reacted in precisely this fashion." But was the Book of Ruth written by a woman, representing only women?

In any case, this dichotomy is far too neat. A characteristic feature of all Jews, until recently, was the tendency to blame ourselves at least partially for historical catastrophes that other communities might have blamed entirely on the Babylonians, the Romans, the Spanish, the Cossacks and so forth. Both biblical books, Ruth and Job, offer profound insights into the human condition. Our common heritage is seriously diminished by playing one off against the other.

Intentionally or not, Turkienicz has adopted the essentialist position of many feminists (claiming not only the unity but also, implicitly, the moral superiority of women). Other feminists, though, have insisted on the "multivocality" of women (the multiplicity of their "voices"). In both cases, reality can be distorted. Those who believe that women are inherently good (unless corrupted by men) almost always believe that men are inherently evil or inadequate. Those who believe that women have varied or even conflicting attitudes don't always acknowledge the same diversity among men. Even our common humanity, therefore, could be diminished by this kind of commentary.

Lubavitcher Rebbe was far more than a teacher

By RABBI ZALMAN AHRON GROSSBAUM

Although the sparsely furnished Bais Hamedrash at 770 Eastern Pwy. contained no more than 400 people, the message they were about to hear would shape the course of Jewish history. Some were well advanced in years, having come to America after World War I. Others had just escaped war-torn Europe. And there were American born rabbinical students who were attracted to Chassidism.

They gathered to commemorate the first yahrzeit of Rabbi Yoseph Yitzchak Schneerson, who died at the age of 70 after emigrating to America in 1940, broken in body but not in spirit. Most prominent amongst those in attendance at the farbrengen (chassidic gathering) was his son-in-law, Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, who for a full year had refused to consider the mantle of leadership.

But that night was different. From all corners of the world, proclamations signed by small groups of Chassidim from Montreal to Melbourne were presented to Rabbi Schneerson, appealing to him to assume leadership of the fledging movement. Finally, with much reluctance and humility, he delivered a chassidic discourse which fused philosophical concepts with a firmly rooted commitment to the needs of each individual Jew.

Now it became official: he was no longer "the Rebbe's son-in-law," no longer "the son of Rabbi Levi Yitzchak Schneerson, a noted scholar and Kabbalist." Now he was "the Lubavitcher Rebbe."

Quoting the Talmudic adage, "When you arrive in a [new] town, follow in their ways," the Rebbe offered a "statement." He declared: "There is ahavat HaShem — love of G-d, ahavat Hatorah — love of Torah, and ahavat Yisrael — love for a fellow Jew. These three are interrelated. There cannot be a love for G-d if there is no ahavat Hatorah and ahavat Yisrael. However, if there is genuine love for a fellow Jew, then eventually love for G-d and Torah will follow. These endeavors will form a cord of three strands which will endure and prepare the world for the arrival of Mashiach."

Wasting no time and sparing no effort, the Rebbe set the tempo to promote his three-pronged plan of action.

Ahavat Yisrael is based on the teaching of the Baal Shem Tov and thoroughly expounded in chassidic literature. The Rebbe taught, displayed and promulgated unconditional love of every single Jew, wise or simple, rich or poor, young or old, friend or foe. One could never discern any distinction in the eyes of the Rebbe. He opened the door of his study and the depth of his heart indiscriminately to all.

Three nights each week, when the Rebbe received visitors, the antechamber included the full spectrum of Jewish life. At a farbrengen, it was quite common to see a senior Chassid with a long white beard sitting next to a university student with an unkempt head of hair. To the Rebbe they had so much in common that their differences paled. The Rebbe felt the need and found the time to address young children who seemed to be lacking in maturity, teaching them to appreciate his message. So too, he saw the need to address seniors, some of whom were well advanced in years and found it difficult to focus or perhaps were dozing. To the Rebbe it was time well spent.

Ahavat Hatorah: Here too the Rebbe personified perfection and wholeness. From the simplicity of a verse in Bereishit to the depth of Kabbalah, from a page in Talmud to a passage in Midrash, they were all the word of G-d. His commitment and dedication to Torah was not restricted to pilpul (Talmudic extrapolation), Halachah (law) or Kabbalah, but rather he endeavored to fuse all aspects of Torah into a unified tapestry. An examination of the sedrah synthesized all of the facets of Torah. A clear understanding of the Agadah (Talmudic homiletics) consumed the Rebbe's attention with the same intensity as a halachic debate.

The Rebbe's approach to Torah transcended the pursuit of knowledge, intellectual prowess or historical value. To the Rebbe, it was the word of G-d, given to the Jewish nation as the bridge to holiness and G-dliness. He focused on the essence of Torah and its inherent connection to each and every Jew. To the Rebbe, the symphony within Torah reflected the diversity within the Nation. Thus the Torah could truly be considered the property of every Jew equally. For indeed, each person identifies with the essence of Torah while maintaining an affinity for a specific discipline.

Ahavat HaShem: The Rebbe embodied a commitment which was unwavering and unconditional. He believed, taught and personified perfect faith. The Talmudic statement "No bad descends from Heaven" was for him an absolute.

Thus when people came to the Rebbe with pain, problems or doubts, they left with comfort, courage and commitment. Even the most towering obstacles and heart-wrenching calamities were addressed from a perspective of Divine providence, albeit perhaps temporarily camouflaged. When the message came from the Rebbe, whose attachment to G-d was exemplary, it penetrated the psychological callousness of the listener and touched his soul. And indeed they came, committed, indifferent, leaders and children. People from all walks of life, from the four corners of the world. There were no barriers, neither in language, nor in culture.

In that very first farbrengen, the Rebbe quoted Rabbi Schneer Zalman of Liadi, the first Rebbe of Chabad, who stated that Chabad is apolitical, with an all embracing message to klal Israel. This, like all other pronouncements of the Rebbe was not empty words, but found its expression in practice without delay.

Shlichim were dispatched throughout the world. Some left for Morocco, where reaching Jews in small farming villages entailed travel on horse or donkey and the Shabbat meal consisted of canned tuna. Others were stationed as far away as Melbourne or Milan. They departed with empty pockets, lots of confidence and a heart brimming with thanksgiving that they could join the ranks of the Rebbe's brigade. With conviction and zest, they eagerly put into practice the Rebbe's mission statement which remains as perfectly intact today as the day it was issued 45 years ago.

In pursuit of the mission, their task was twofold: To expose, teach and enhance the standard of commitment and to bring about a brighter world permeated with the light of Torah and the observance of mitzvot.

The Rebbe promoted educational endeavors catering to the needs of children, students, families and seniors. To facilitate this mandate, schools, shuls, mikvahs and camps were established.

At the same time, the Rebbe revolutionized the "one mitzvah" approach which called on people to "taste" Yiddishkeit with no prior or post commitment. It began in 1967, when Jews of all persuasion flocked to the remnants of our Holy Temple and eagerly embraced the opportunity to express their Jewishness in some tangible form. The one mitzvah approach was further enhanced by mobile homes outfitted with tefillin, mezuzot, candlesticks and literature. The "tanks," as the Rebbe called them, reached destinations where conventional means of travel were ineffective or beyond reach. They were stationed at the Eiffel Tower, on Fifth Avenue and at the Joe Robbie Stadium. People began getting acquainted and comfortable with t'fillin and mezuzot, even if they were not ready for a comprehensive commitment.

But the Rebbe was not content. Notwithstanding the popularity of the tshuvah movement, which was evident all over the world and found expression even in the most alienated and seemingly assimilated families, we were still in galut, a condition unacceptable to the Rebbe, given the hardship, persecution and suffering of almost 2,000 years of exile.

He believed with perfect faith something that for many was an uncomfortable subject — to the extent that to some it was considered unJewish! To others, it was relegated as a study, almost no different than ancient history; perhaps intriguing, interesting, but far from the reality of the "real world." Not so for the Rebbe. From the very first day and throughout his 40-some years of leadership, he believed in Mashiach; and our efforts towards hastening his arrival were an integral part of the mission. The Rebbe envisioned a perfect world and universal peace, free of strife, war and hunger.

Indeed, during the last years of the Rebbe's sojourn in this world, he clearly stated that the arrival of Mashiach was at hand. He implored his Chassidim to sensitize the world at large to this reality by learning about Mashiach, and to contribute towards bringing this reality to fruition by doing more mitzvot and acts of kindness.

Then the unthinkable happened. Two years ago on the third day of Tamuz 5754, the Rebbe's physical presence was taken from us. We Chassidim and schlichim who had the great z'chut (privilege) to work with the Rebbe were orphaned, but not forsaken. Our hearts are scarred and shattered, but continue to beat with intensity. We may have been ravaged with grief, but our love and loyalty to the Rebbe would not allow us to waver.

In parshat Bamidbar, we read: "These are the children of Aaron and Moses on the day that G-d spoke to Moses." Then the Torah proceeds to record the children of Aaron, but make no mention of Moses' progeny. The Talmud notes: "He who teaches Torah to the children of others may consider them as his own." But why would the Torah offer this insight with respect to Aaron's children? Because it was Moses who petitioned G-d on their behalf and successfully interceded on behalf of Elazar and Etamar.

The Rebbe was not merely a teacher but a leader; he was not merely a guardian but a father, one who dedicated his entire life to the well-being of klal Israel and reb Israel. His concern for the individual was no less than his concern for the community. He sustained us, provided for us and interceded on our behalf with unconditional love.

The Rebbe never allowed for retirement, complacency or mediocracy. Time, talent and opportunity were a gift from G-d and should be utilized in the fullest measure. This legacy remains vibrant in the hearts and mind of all his shlichim, who continue their sacred calling with vigor, vitality and fortitude. We remain his children and committed to fulfil his wish and his lifelong ambition. He remains our father.

Oy Tate, have mercy on your children!

A significant change

Nearly two weeks ago, Israelis went to sleep thinking that Shimon Peres had won the election by a narrow margin; they woke up realizing that Benjamin Netanyahu had won by an even narrower majority. The "overnight transformation" is now sinking in. The last two weeks have been a period of intense self-examination and scrutiny, and of prolific analysis of the election campaign and the man who is now prime minister. Israelis recognize that a significant political and social change has taken place: how they are governed, by whom they are governed and how they see themselves — are all different.

By Shira Herzog

The new electoral system of direct elections for prime minister has had an immediate impact on negotiations for a coalition government with those parties that have indicated a willingness to join in. While the prime minister-elect is still subject to pressure from the three religious parties, Sharansky's immigrants' party and Kehalani's Third Way, they can no longer manoeuvre their way between two potential prime ministers as in the past.

Netanyahu's power as prime minister does not derive from his cabinet, but rather directly from the people. Indeed, the characteristics of a "semi-presidential" system have already been noted. Netanyahu himself has not engaged in an extensive consultative process with his potential coalition partners and there are indications that he will expand the powers of the Prime Minister's Office on security and economic matters, to incorporate a structure similar to that of the White House. However, Israel does not presently have a presidential system. The prime minister, Prime Minister's Office and Knesset will have to adjust to a new relationship, with a new set of checks and balances that have not yet been tested and that many view as too weak.

The Likud's return to power in 1996 differs considerably from its first terms in government, in 1977 and 1981. Then, Likud's rise marked the end of Labor's hegemony as the leading party in the Israeli political establishment. Likud altered the landscape of Israeli politics, made peace with Egypt and permanently changed the nature of Israel's presence in the territories. Likud's settlement policy throughout the '80s has had a profound impact on the nature of the arrangements that will be negotiated with the Palestinians. However, Israel's business, academic and cultural elites remained largely affiliated with the Labor party throughout the 15 years of Likud and then joint government, until Likud's defeat in 1992.

This time around, with a young, American-style prime minister and a crop of younger, talented politicians, Likud's challenge to Labor's support in these elites will be different. Most significant are the unprecedented criticism of the press' supposed pro-Labor bias by senior Likud spokespeople and Netanyahu's reported interest in encouraging the development of an intellectual capacity to better represent his economic and political views. Israel's intellectual community supports Labor, and intellectual content on the right has come primarily from nationalist religious circles. Netanyahu wishes to correct this imbalance.

In real terms, however, the division between Labor and Likud is no longer the dominant one in Israeli society. If the peace process continues successfully, the political space occupied by the two large parties will be dramatically transformed over the next decade, as social and economic policies become central issues. In this scenario, the differences in their position on the territories will become less and less significant. And, in any case, the last election showed that Israeli society is divided along several faultlines .

The cleavages between Jews and Arabs, religious and secular Jews, immigrant and veteran groups, and Ashkenazi and Sephardi Israelis — all are represented in the Knesset, for the most part outside of Likud and Labor. The state's founders' ethos of an Israeli "melting pot," which was exemplified in the labor establishment of the state'e early years, has given way in a few short decades, to a multicultural society in which ethnic, national, religious and sectoral identity is more important than a common identification with the state. There is not one definition of what an "Israeli" is. Israelis sense this, and in the coming months and years there will likely be important efforts to further understand this phenomenon and to move constructively towards the future.

Everyone asks: What will Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu and his government do with the peace process, which he has pledged to continue? What shape will it take and how will the Arab world react? While there is a pervasive human tendency to play the prophet, I will conquer my impulse and turn to something that is considerably more secure and accessible — and that is history.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

It has been said that the recent election was the "first time that Israel has chosen a prime minister by direct election." In the recent past, party conventions selected the leader and potential prime minister, while this time it was through a direct popular vote. Did anything of this kind ever occur before? The fact is that it did, albeit more than 3,000 years ago, in the time of the judges.

This was the period after Joshua, the successor of Moses, had invaded the land and begun to settle large parts of it. At his death, however, the 12 tribes were without a leader who could ward off the multitude of enemies that beset them all around. In addition, many people drifted away from traditional religious practices and intermingled with the native peoples, adopting their ways of life. The time during which all of this took place was the 12th to 11th centuries BCE.

Occasionally, when internal and external crises became too potent, the tribes would agree on the leadership of one person. Such leaders were called shoftim, which is generally translated as "judges." They combined judicial and military office and enjoyed the support of the people. Sometimes they came from well-established families and at other times they did not. For instance, Jephthah had all the wrong family connections, but when times were tough, the people came to him and said, "Be our leader." Amongst the shoftim was also one woman, Deborah.

What all of the shoftim had in common during a span of some 200 years, was their popular acclaim. While we cannot speak of elections in a modern sense, they were raised to their status by the people (and, the text several times adds, through the mysterious agency of God). They did not become kings who handed their office to their offspring. By stretching our terminology, we may indeed say that these leaders were "directly elected," and it was they who governed the tribes during two turbulent centuries of occupying and living in the Land of Promise — a practice that lasted till the end of the 11th century when Saul became the first king of the united tribes.

As I look at the recent elections, I find what was most remarkable was the way in which they were held. Despite the violent rhetoric that preceded them, and despite the unbelievably close result which testified to the deep rift that runs through the Israeli society, the result was accepted by the people. Whatever may lie in Israel's political future, one thing was proven in this election: a young country, separated by thousands of years from the experience of choosing its leader, has the democratic process firmly rooted in its soil. That alone is something to be marvelled at.

T.S. Eliot and anti-Semitism

Anti-Semitism is in the news again, this time running the gamut from the proste to the literary elite. Marge Schott, owner of baseball's Cincinnati Reds, continues to prattle on about her views on Hitler, rephrasing a 1992 view that Hitler "was OK at first." As described in a recent article in Sports Illustrated, she really doesn't "get it" with regards to bigotry, and seems mired in an America of the 1930s or the 1950s.

By Morton Weinfeld

What is unclear is what steps embarrassed baseball officials can take against her. Under pressure, Schott has just agreed to withdraw from the day-to-day running of the team for two years. But she remains as owner.

But anti-Semitism infects not only boors and the ignorant. At the other end of the cultural spectrum, we find T. S. Eliot, the great British poet. A recent study by British lawyer Anthony Julius has called attention to the clear strain of anti-Semitism found in Eliot's poetry and other writing.

His volume, T. S. Eliot, Anti-Semitism and Literary Form, has caused a storm in the United Kingdom, though a belated six months after publication. (I have not yet read the book; so I rely on several reviews in what follows.) First Julius reminds us of the extent of Eliot's anti-Semitism. He then contends that Eliot's anti-Semitism is not a minor feature of his work, but is rather central to those texts in which it is found.

Julius is not the first to identify and analyse the anti-Semitism in Eliot's work and his private life. This prejudice apparently survived World War II and the revelations about the Holocaust. But Julius also criticizes the various literary commentators who have sought to rationalize or minimize that anti-Semitism over the years, lest it weaken Eliot's place in the canon of modern English literature.

It is no wonder that the British literary establishment has been uneasy in its response; apparently several publishers rejected the manuscript and critical reaction to the book was a long time coming.

Was Eliot an anti-Semite? In the view of the Anglo-Jewish intellectual Sir Isaiah Berlin, who knew Eliot, there is little doubt. When Berlin confronted Eliot about some anti-Semitic passages in his After Strange Gods, Eliot denied he was an anti-Semite. But in Berlin's view, "Eliot's beliefs were the same as Ezra Pound's. Only more cautious." Actually, this is not surprising since Pound discovered Eliot the young poet and served as his early mentor.

How should we respond to such artists and their work? If I recall correctly, after decades of opposition, the Israeli Philharmonic recently agreed to include a selection by Wagner in its repertoire.

I personally have no consistent response to these sorts of issues. I have always enjoyed Eliot's poetry and still rank The Lovesong of J. Alfred Prufrock as one of my favorite poems. I am unclear how the fact of his anti-Semitism ought to be introduced into high school and university courses where he is taught, and how central it should become. On the other hand, I refuse to read or celebrate Ezra Pound, perhaps because he went so far as to broadcast Fascist propaganda into the United States during the war. Similarly, I will not pay to see a film with Vanessa Redgrave.

All these are idiosyncratic, subjective responses, and not artistic judgments. It is likely that Eliot's reputation, both as a person and as a writer, will be slightly tarnished as a result of Julius' book. So be it. Moreover, given the culture of Eliot's class and times, it is likely that other writers of the period are also ripe for a re-examination of their overt or covert prejudices.

One wonders whether Eliot's brand of anti-Semitism has declined or whether, in Isaiah Berlin's terms, it has simply become more cautious.

The Kirshner File

Goldhagen's thesis marred by glaring shortcomings

In this column last week, I delved into Daniel Jonah Goldhagen's much-acclaimed book, Hitler's Willing Executioners (Random House, $34.95), which is shaping up as the most important account of the Holocaust since the publication of The Destruction of the European Jews by Raul Hilberg.

By Sheldon Kirshner

Goldhagen, a Harvard historian, focuses his attention on the perpetrators, namely the German ones, and reaches the conclusion that "ordinary" Germans from all walks of life, many of them not even Nazis, willingly took part in the mass murder of Jews. Goldhagen ascribes their fanaticism to the virulent strain of eliminationist anti-Semitism which gripped German society from the 19th century to the Nazi era.

To illustrate his thesis, he concentrates on the Order Police, which carried out wholesale massacres of Jews and whose membership was largely composed of elderly reservists who were anything but Nazi zealots.

The lesson he draws from the social composition of the Order Police, and of unit 101 in particular, is that it was broadly representative of German society. Still more damning is the fact that its recruits could withdraw from killing operations without serious consequences.

That very few Germans exercised this option is explained by their deep-seated anti-Semitism. Jews were regarded as cancerous boils to be lanced from the body politic. "For those who believed that Jewry was locked in an apocalyptic battle with Germandom, to annihilate Jewry appeared just and necessary."

Goldhagen provides two other examples to bolster his thesis. First, able-bodied Jewish slave workers were ruthlessly exterminated, to the detriment of Germany's war production. Second, local German commanders, cut off from headquarters and under no compulsion to do so, took it upon themselves to organize death marches as Germany reeled in defeat in 1945.

Furthermore, he claims, only an insignificant percentage of Germans were opposed to the state's anti-Semitic policy. "Had ordinary Germans not shared their leadership's eliminationist ideals, then they would have reacted to the ever-intensifying assault on their Jewish countrymen ... with at least as much opposition and noncooperation as they did to their government's attacks on Christianity and to the ... euthanasia program."

In closing, he argues that Hitler's anti-Jewish policies won widespread approval because the Nazis merely unshackled "pre-existing, pent-up anti-Semitism."

Goldhagen's arguments, though quite often repetitious, are certainly persuasive at times. It is indisputable that "ordinary" Germans were complicit in the Holocaust. And it is plainly evident that the Nazi regime's demonization of Jews could not have succeeded without a deeply-ingrained anti-Semitic tradition.

Yet there are serious gaps in Goldhagen's scholarship. He vastly underestimates the role of indifference in human behavior. He glosses over the Nazis' ability to produce conformity in what was, after all, a totalitarian state. He offers no compelling evidence that German civilians en masse concurred with Hitler's eliminationist anti-Semitism. He fails to explain why the regime tried to suppress information about the Holocaust. He does not reconcile the high intermarriage rates in early 20th century Germany, which implied a degree of acceptance of Jews, with the vicious anti-Semitism which animated far too many Germans. And finally, he does not elaborate upon a central theme: If the Germans were such dyed-in-the-wool anti-Semites, why have the post-war Germans been able to reinvent themselves into "liberal democrats?"

Golden age in Germany

The period from Germany's unification in 1871 to the rise of Adolf Hitler in 1933 was the golden age of German Jewry.

Until the end of the 18th century, the great majority of Jews in the German states had been on the margins of society. With emancipation in 1871, Jews were able to make advances which enhanced their acceptance and integration into the mainstream.

But, as Peter Pulzer shrewdly observes in Jews and the German State (Blackwell), Germany after 1871 was basically "a land of unequal opportunity," with most branches of the public services virtually barred to unbaptized Jews.

As Pulzer — an Oxford professor of government and public administration — points out in this rigorous study, conversion made all the difference.

Before 1918, for example, only one unbaptized Jew — Moritz Elstatter of Baden — managed to become a cabinet minister. Converted Jews fared much better. In the debate on Jewish emancipation, which lasted from the end of the 18th century to the 1860s, the consensus among liberals was that Jews should shed their peculiar ways and merge completely with Germans.

As a result of this mindset, civil service jobs, the diplomatic corps, university positions and army commissions were all but forbidden to unconverted Jews.

Despite these restrictions, some of which persisted well into this century, German Jews made a mark in various fields, notably publishing and finance.

Due to their status, most Jews were drawn to liberal political parties. According to Pulzer's breakdown, two-thirds of Jewish voters cast their ballots for the Progressive party. Of the rest, about half voted Social Democrat, while the remainder were largely scattered among the Centre party and the National Liberals.

However, in the first two decades of this century, a minuscule minority was drawn to left-wing revolutionary politics — namely Rosa Luxembourg, Kurt Eisner, Paul Hirsch and Ernst Toller.

Pulzer writes that World War I thrust an unprecedented number of Jews into major public positions. Albert Ballin — the shipping magnate — was charged with insuring that essential supplies reached the civilian population, while Walther Rathenau — the industrialist (and foreign minister in the early 1920s) — was recruited to increase the production of military equipment.

Yet, Pulzer adds, the sudden elevation of Jews into such prominence provoked an anti-Semitic backlash for their removal.

Anti-Semitic violence grew after World War I, and the assassination of Rathenau by a radical rightist was symptomatic of the poisonous climate. After 1923, only one Jew served as a Reich minister, and when Chancellor Heinrich Bruning wanted to offer a ministerial post to a Jewish candidate in 1930, he had to back down. Such was the temper of the times.

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

Some unexpected answers

Can everyone be rich? Most people would answer, not really! Can everyone be wise? These are two of the four questions found in the first verse of the fourth chapter of a classical book in Judaism — Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers).

Ben Zoma asks: Who is wise? Who is strong? Who is wealthy? Who is honored or respected? He then gives unexpected but very meaningful answers.

He suggests that everyone can be wise, regardless of academic studies, professions or work. Wisdom comes from the commitment to keep on learning each and every day. We can do so from books, from people and from life experiences that we encounter in all walks of life. It is necessary to have an open mind and only then can we learn something each and every day.

The second question, Who is strong? does not refer to physical strength, because that is a gift from the Almighty. Ben Zoma refers to spiritual strength to overcome temptations and not be carried away by anger or pride. This spiritual strength comes from Torah, mitzvot and wisdom. One who gives in to temptation may have temporary pleasure but does permament harm to himself.

The third question is Who is rich? It is not only a person with material possessions, but rather one who has the right attitudes to be content with what he has. People can be wealthy but never satisfied because they look over their shoulders and see that others may have more than they have. Consider yourself wealthy if you have good health, a good living and a good family.

The fourth question is Who is honored and respected? Ben Zoma gives a very direct answer — respect others and you will be respected yourself.

One of the fascinating aspects of study of the six chapters of Pirkei Avot is that there are so many interpretations that can be read into them. We can say that they are synonymous with four stages in life. When we are young, we want to acquire wisdom and be able to answer the many questions we have from childhood on. In our teenage and young adult years, we must learn that real strength is not to give into passions or temptations as we leave home, go to school and establish our own life. As we establish our own family life, we want to acquire material possessions, but equally importantly, the right attitude to them. Last but not least, every person wants to be respected and establish a good name in the community they live in.

I believe that Ben Zoma leads us in the right direction to make life more meaningful to ourselves and more beneficial to the community at large.

Holocaust revealed

Beyond Imagination: Canadians Write About the Holocaust (McClelland & Stewart Inc., $29.99).

In Posen on Oct. 4, 1943, Heinrich Himmler told an assembly of high ranking SS officers, "The killing of the Jews is the most glorious page in our history, one not written and one which will never be written." He then advised them to keep the mass extermination a secret that they should carry to the grave.

Every article, reminiscence or book about the Holocaust is an attempt to reveal the dread secret, to make the horror known to still uninformed and disbelieving men and women.

In Beyond Imagination, 21 of Canada's most eminent Jewish writers try through essays, memoirs, short stories and poems — to bear witness to the most catastrophic and inexplicable event of our century.

The well known political advisor Roy Faibish turned down the editor's request for a response because he found the task "too awesome, too awful ... it is beyond expression and I am unable to reply." He mentions Primo Levi, who killed himself when confronted by the need to understand the evil that led to the "final solution," and who said, "To understand is almost to justify."

Morley Torgov, after spending a vapid evening among upper class Toronto Jews wonders, "Who it is down through the ages that has been in control of this universe — God? Satan? Or are they, God and Satan, more or less equal shareholders and directors in this enterprise, with Satan running things Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays, God in charge Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays; both of them taking time off on the seventh day to play a little golf and, over Sunday brunch, plan new blessing and catastrophes? Are we humans simply one of their experiments that has gone wrong?"

For David Lewis Stein, novelist and journalist, the Jews as a people are drifting to the fringes of society. He muses that there are as many babies born in China in a single year (17 million) as there are Jews in the entire world. Pessimistically he concludes. "Our time in the spotlight is over. We Jews are going back to being a peculiar people on the edge of the history."

When she was a pupil in the Holy Blossom Temple religious school, Erna Paris, then 14, listened to a record of the ranting of Adolf Hitler. "The wild, shrill notes of rage emerging from the little turntable froze my blood." Heinz Warschauer, principal of the school, who played the record for the class, "slowly rolled up his sleeve so that we could see the purple numbers carved into his skin. His tatooed arm and Hitler's shrieking voice lodged themselves permanently in my memory."

Many years later, she met Warschauer sitting alone in a shopping mall. "He told me he had cancer ... he is dead now and I wish I had thought to tell him how much he had influenced my life. I didn't. I suppose I couldn't. It was too soon, and I was still to young to know."

Irving Layton, in a poem to his sons, implores them not to become victims, but to be, symbolically, "Gunners in the Israeli Air Force."

The contributions of Howard Engel, Larry Zolf, Leonard Cohen, Michael Marrus, Peter Newman and others in addition to those already indicated, help make this a many-sided and continually absorbing anthology.

Zdzislaw Przgoda, now a Toronto resident of 83, tells a continually exciting life story: survival in German concentration camps, a sojourn in Israel, life in Canada as an engineer and participant in the manifold activities of Polish organizations.

The Way to Freedom is also an eyewitness account of the 1917 Russian Revolution, stirring events of World War I, as well as an interesting depiction of "life of the Warsaw society of artists, writers, theatre life and academia in prewar times." He writes, "My story provides unique resources for those who like to learn history not only from handbooks, but also from contact with eyewitnesses of the events."

This brief memoir, vivid and filled with adventure, adds to our knowledge of some of the most significant events of our time.

Recalling fallen soldiers of Britain's Jewish Brigade

By NETTA ZUKERMAN
Special to The CJN

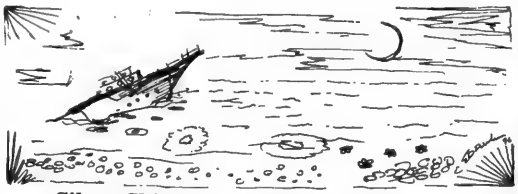
The following poem was evoked by the shallow rectangular memorial dedicated to 43 Jewish soldiers who formed part of the Jewish Brigade. They were killed on their way to join the Allied Forces and their bodies were never recovered. The name of each soldier is carefully recorded, together with his personal details.

The memorial is a shallow pool covered with approximately four inches of water. The stone prow of a ship silently stands on one side of the pool and wreaths of roses and flowers float on the water.



Silent Ships

Sea of faces
Seas of flowers
Seas ...
Silent prow of stone ship
Stands on guard ...
Shallow waters
Cover unknown graves
Of young, young men,
Youths, once
Vibrant, joyous and quick.
Floating shadows
in unknown waters.
Reflections — reflecting
Wreaths of roses —
Floating, floating ...
Firmly anchored
Within our hearts.

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Did you know that a detailed history of China was foretold in the Book of Daniel? Or that imot and imahot are both acceptable translations of the word "mothers" in Hebrew? Or that the election of Benjamin Netanyahu is the best/worst thing that has ever happened to the Jewish people?

Those are just some of the facts and feelings you will read about on the Jewish Highway's Newsgroups. To get an understanding of the scope and power of Newsgroups, think of them as a worldwide collection of thousands of bulletin boards. When you find a topic that interests you, you post a message which can be seen around the world. Other people will see your message, respond to it and cause further reaction. Sometimes these discussions (or "threads") will result in a valuable exchange of information and opinion. All too often they degenerate into childish name calling.

Newsgroups began with the Usenet computer network back in 1979, long before anybody had heard of the World Wide Web or even the Internet. Lacking the graphics and sounds that have become a part of what makes the Web so inviting, Newsgroups still rely on the power of words. And unlike the structured pages of the Internet, Newsgroups succeed or fail depending on the input of their visitors.

For a more detailed description of the history of Newsgroups and how they work, visit [http://www.cis.ohio-state.edu/hypertext/faq/usenet/usenet/whatis/top.html].

For the purposes of this article, I will assume that you know how to read Newsgroups. If you don't, I suggest that you contact your Internet company for more information. Also, please bear in mind that your Internet provider may not give you access to every Newsgroup but may make more of them available upon request.

I have come across over 200 Newsgroups that touch on some aspect of Judaism or Israel (out of the over 18,000 groups which I have access to). Some of these Newsgroups have thousands of individual messages in them. Less popular groups are often empty. Unfortunately, I haven't found a central listing of Jewish Newsgroups.

But if you search Newsgroup titles for the words "israel," "jewish," "judaism," "mideast" or "shamash," you will be able to track down most of them.

When you do your search, you'll come across varied groups ranging from [alt.music.jewish] to [soc.culture.jewish.holocaust] to [israel.jobs.misc]. However, the most popular Newsgroups include [soc.culture.jewish], [soc.culture.israel], [talk.politics.mideast] and [israel.lists.il-talk]. Hot topics of discussion come and go. Predictably at the moment there is much debate about the Netanyahu victory and the role of the religious parties in his government.

Some Newsgroups are "moderated." That means that before any message is listed, an individual screens the message to ensure its contents are relevant to that Newsgroup. This helps weed out a lot of the kooks. But many Newsgroups are unmoderated. That means that anything (anything!) sent in is automatically posted.

So you are taking your good taste in your own hands when you peer into these groups.

There's no telling whether you're going to be pleased, amused or repulsed. Consider yourself warned.

A different kind of Newsgroup which you may have access to is called ClariNews and is worth checking out. Unlike other Newsgroups, you can't post a message to ClariNews. Rather, that's the place to go for recent international news stories from Reuters and UPI news services. Two ClariNews groups of particular interest are [clari.world.mideast.israel] and [clari.news.jews].

Which brings us to that old joke that if you put five Jews in a room, you are bound to get six opinions. Thats nothing. Because thanks to Newsgroups, that room can now be occupied by thousands of visitors and presumably even more opinions.

Soldiers say Diaspora Jews unaware of Israel today

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Diaspora Jews seem to care deeply about Israel, but many are not knowledgeable about the country as it is today — particularly its army, according to young IDF soldiers who were in Toronto recently.

Yaniv Wainshtain, 21, a Navy officer, said that Israel isn't the romanticized version of a soldier holding a gun in one hand while working the field with the other. "The army is mostly very hard work."

Wainshtain and three other IDF officers were honored at a gala dinner and dance held recently at Le Parc by the Toronto branch of the Association for the Soldiers of Israel on behalf of the Canadian Zionist Cultural Association.

During their one-week stay in Toronto they visited Richmond Hill Community School, Associated Hebrew Day School's Danilack branch and Bialik Hebrew Day School, where The CJN followed them from class to class as they met with students.

Bialik students had collected over $4,000 to fund a lounge at an IDF base.

Their questions ran the gamut from "Do you know my cousin?" to "If you take weapons and destroy countries, won't they destroy you?"

Ofer Lerner, 23, an artillery company commander, told the Grade 1 student who asked the latter question that Israel is in "a difficult situation. It has peace with some neighbors but not others. Some of those countries want to destroy us, and we have to protect ourselves."

"We try not to create a new war," added Erez Chehanover, 24, a pilot in the Israeli air force.

When a Grade 5 class learned that Chehanover was an F-16 pilot, there was a collective intake of breath and the ultimate kids' compliment: "Cool!"

Chehanover has been in the IDF for six years and has four to go.

Israelis enter the army at the age of 18 for a minimum of two years (women) and three years (men). Officers take extra training and must spend more than the minimum time in service, explained Ety Abokasis, 21, a basic training company commander who teaches new soldiers about "weapons, discipline, values — the things every soldier has to know."

From left, Israeli soldiers Ofer Lerner, Ety Abokasis and Yaniv Wainshtain were guests of honor at a recent gala dinner.

The army is a strong unifying force in Israel, bringing together people of diverse religious backgrounds and varying political beliefs, said Wainshtain.

Although the army experience can shape soldiers' political opinions, it doesn't necessarily shape them in the same direction. While one of the four soldiers has shifted slightly leftward in political belief, another knows of people who have become more hawkish in the army.

"When I'm out of uniform, I think what I want to think," said Abokasis, "but it's not affecting my work. We do what we have to do."

Lerner urges Diaspora Jews to maintain a strong connection with Israel. "We are one people," he said.

The year 2000... Already?

Is time moving quicker - or what?

The months and the seasons pass so quickly.
What happened to last Summer - did we have a Fall?
The good news is that we're all living longer, but the bad news is that the needs are overwhelming and are changing dramatically from one generation to the next.
Because of that, we are going to build a new home for the aged that will take us into the future.

Help us be there when you need us!

Holocaust stamps highlight exhibition

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – The official philatelic showcard the Israel Postal Authority released at the CAPEX '96 international philatelic convention here last week bears the stamps of two countries — Canada and Israel — making it unlike all previous showcards Israel has released annually since 1981.

Both stamps were issued in 1995. The Israeli stamp commemorates the end of World War II and the liberation of the camps. The Canadian stamp, designed by Q30 Design Inc. of Toronto, is a stark remembrance of the 50th anniversary of the Holocaust.

Yinon Beilen, director of the Israel Philatelic Service, expressed gratitude to Canada Post for issuing the Holocaust stamp and for granting permission for it to be reproduced. As Beilen noted, the legend "Holocaust 1933-1945 L'Holocauste" appears on the stamp, while the word "Shoah" appears in both English and Hebrew in the margin. "To see Hebrew letters on a Canadian stamp, saying 'Shoah,' I'm very moved by this," he said.

Pnina Zilberman, director of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, expressed pride that the organization had provided various Holocaust memorabilia to the stamp's design team. "I would like to compliment the government of Canada in taking the initiative with this stamp," she said. "Although right after the war Canada was closed to the survivors, as described in the book None Is Too Many, this situation has been corrected."

Zilberman also noted that Robert Engel, immediate past chair of the Holocaust Remembrance Committee, is the only known living Canadian to be depicted in a stamp issued by Canada Post. Engel, whose profile appears on an ID card on the Holocaust stamp, was reunited at the convention with John Prince of Florida, a former school friend from pre-war Berlin who had recognized his likeness on the stamp. (See story below).

Glenda Rissman, one of four artists from the Toronto firm Q30 Design Inc. which designed the stamp, said that she and her partners were initially unsure if it could be done effectively. "My first thought was, 'How on earth are we going to summarize the Holocaust in the size of a postage stamp?'" she recounted.

There were also ethical issues to consider, she said. "We had to ask ourselves, 'Why should Canada commemorate a tragic event that it did so little to stop?' It was a moral dilemma.

"After talking with my father about it, I realized that if Canada Post came to us to design the stamp, it meant that they felt we could handle the subject fairly and honestly. And so it was a challenge we decided to accept."

Rissman showed slides of various alternate designs for the stamp. One showed a yellow Jewish star imprinted with Jude front and centre, while another depicted an open passport, stamped with a 'J' for Jewish, that was burnt along the edges. Still others used sketches of the death camps rendered by Canadian artists Aba Bayefsky and Alex Colville.

All were rejected, however, in favor of the chosen design, which bears a montage of lean, desperate faces above a yellow Jewish star, a passport, and part of a blue-and-white striped prisoner's uniform. "Everyone agrees that Canada Post took a risk in going with our design, because it's not really a comfortable stamp to look at," Rissman said.

"It's a privilege to be able to use this medium to highlight our history and the diversity of our cultural traditions," said Ted Scott, manager of marketing and sales for Canada Post.

As well, he expressed "a tremendous sense of pride that the Israel Philatelic Service has chosen to honor us in this way."

Haim Waxman, the consul of Israel in Toronto, invited the several hundred dealers and collectors in the room to attend the international philatelic gathering in 1998, when it will be held in Israel to coincide with celebrations marking the 50th anniversary of the Jewish state.

The Canadian Association for Israel Philately meets monthly in Toronto from September to June. For information, write to CAFIP, P.O. Box 33, 260 Adelaide St. E., Toronto M5A 1N1.

Stamp helps to reunite friends

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A piece of paper measuring just 3 by 4.8 centimetres has reunited two men who haven't seen each other in 60 years.

It was Canada's much-praised Holocaust stamp that twigged the memory of John Prince of Sarasota, Fla. More accurately, a small likeness at the bottom of the 45-cent issue got him wondering: was this the face of a pre-war boyhood chum who disappeared suddenly from their Berlin high school?

Prince's prodigious memory had not failed him. The face belongs to Toronto's Robert Engel, a schoolmate from the 1930s and now a well-known local Holocaust survivor and educator.

The two spent much of last week reminiscing about their salad days. Prince was in town for the World Philatelic Exhibition, held at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

An avid philatelist, he first noticed Canada's Holocaust stamp in a collector's magazine. Among the collage of faces on the stamp was the small, half-shown one of a 17-year-old Engel, taken from his ID card, issued in Holland in 1941. The magazine said Engel was born in Berlin and was now living in Toronto.

"I said, 'Jeepers, that face looks familiar,' " Prince, 71, told The CJN. "Don't ask me why I remembered him. I just did."

He started calling all the Engels in the Toronto phone book. Eventually, a friend helped track Engel down and letters were exchanged.

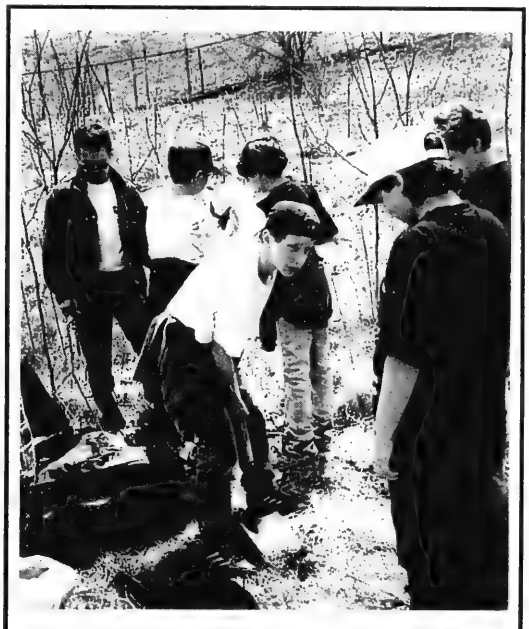
Even though he last saw Engel when the two were around 13, Prince said his old soccer buddy has changed little.

"What I do remember very vividly," Prince added, "is that all of a sudden, he was gone one day. I never got an answer about where he was."

Engel quit the Berlin high school in 1937. "I couldn't stand the anti-Semitism any longer," he recalled. "The teachers began each lesson with 'Heil Hitler!' We had race theory lessons every day." He ended up at a public school for Jews.

A non-Jew, Prince spent the war in Britain, flying for the RAF. Engel was arrested by the Gestapo one day before he was to escape to England and spent 2½ years at the Westerbork concentration camp in Nazi-occupied Holland, before being liberated by Canadian troops.

"We never really socialized," Engel said of Prince. "We just played soccer on the same team." Engel doesn't recall much of his erstwhile friend, except "those eyes. They're very familiar."



STUDENTS HELP TO SAVE DON RIVER

The grade 7 students of United Synagogue Day School, Bayview campus, were involved in an environmental project to save the Don River, at North York General Hospital. Brian Katz, a social worker at the hospital, who spearheads the project, walked the group through the area and explained how it is being replanted and beautified for the public's enjoyment. The students planted trees that they had donated to the project and received a certificate of appreciation.

Abella receives Distinguished Alumnus Award

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Rosalie Silberman Abella, a judge of the Ontario Court of Appeal, recently became the first woman to win the Distinguished Alumnus Award from the Law Alumni Association of the University of Toronto.

Since graduating from the University of Toronto Law School in 1970, Abella's career has included such appointments as chair of the Ontario Labor Relations Board and the Ontario Law Reform Commission, sole commissioner on the Royal Commission on Equality in Employment and service on the Ontario Human Rights Commission. At age 29, she became the youngest person ever to be sworn in as an Ontario judge.

At the recent Law Alumni dinner honoring Abella, speakers including former Ontario premier Bob Rae, Justice Kathryn Feldman, former Ontario premier David Peterson, Lorna Marsden, president of Wilfrid Laurier University, and R. Roy McMurtry, Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal for Ontario, all praised Abella for her legal brilliance, her social conscience and her warmth and charm as a friend.

Messages of congratulations were also read from Bertha Wilson and Claire L'Heureux Dube, the first two women to sit on the Ontario Supreme Court.

"In my life, there have been few people I have admired so much and who have contributed to the province so exceptionally. She is an advocate for the people and stands as a role model to many," said Rae.

"It is a measure of Rosie's humanity that she has befriended all the people sitting here today," said Peterson. "This enormous humanity runs through everything she does. She has a sense of love that makes her a great person and a great judge."

McMurtry expressed his delight that with the different political streams represented in the room, everyone was in agreement about Abella's accomplishments. She has encouraged and supported many people in their careers and she is a wonderful role model for women. It is a great joy to have her as a friend, he said.

In accepting the award from Charles Dubin, retired chief justice of the Ontario Court of Appeal, Abella, who was born almost 50 years ago in a refugee camp in Germany, to parents who survived the war but lost a young son, said, "Nothing about this evening or my career seems inevitable to me ... From the beginning of my life nothing was expected, yet everything was hoped for.

"One cannot be born in the shadow of the Holocaust and live with two Jews who survived it, without believing in an exaggerated sense of justice. In our house there was no silence about the past and they never cried when they told the story. I never don't cry when I hear it."

She praised her father, who was a lawyer in Europe and who died while she was in law school. She said he taught her the nobility of law.

"I grew up in a joyful home, where I learned that the only thing to fear is intolerance ... to take nothing for granted, fear no future and work hard. My father's inspiration is all around me."

In addressing the friends who praised her, Abella said one of the joys of aging is watching your friends take over the world.

"Next to chasing my husband [Irving Abella], going to law school was the best decision I have ever made. The legal profession welcomed me with civility. In the over 25 years since I graduated, my faith in the law has not yet been shaken."

Bloor JCC chapel more than just a comfy corner

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The chapel in the Bloor JCC is one of the best-kept secrets in this community.

Tucked away in a corridor off the main lobby, the broadloomed chapel with its plush seats and stained glass is an oasis.

But it is more than just a pretty, comfortable corner. It offers morning services Thursdays, Sundays and at Rosh Chodesh, and it sponsors community events like last month's weekly lunch-time Jewish history lecture series, with Rabbi Mark Dratch. The chapel also does outreach to the Jewish residents at Castleview Wychwood Towers, a nursing home in the vicinity.

The chapel congregation is made up of some 45 regulars, most of them over 65. They have been getting together at the JCC for the last 20 years to exercise, schmooze and daven. Several were members when the facility was located on Brunswick Avenue.

The chapel was started 23 years ago by some members of the JCC Athletic club who were saying Kaddish and wanted to daven at the JCC on Sundays before playing handball.

They put together a minyan and found "a cubby hole" to meet in, said chapel president Leonard Bernstein. "It's the only Jewish athletic facility in North America with a chapel on the premises."

Eventually the JCC allocated some space — an old janitorial closet — for the chapel, and they got a Torah from a former shul on Berkeley Street in the east end, Bernstein said.

He and brother Coleman refurbished the space in 1975 to create the chapel, which is dedicated to their late brother Michael, a soldier killed in World War II.

There is a minyan at all services, but Sundays the place is packed. The weekly kiddush is a time for kibbitzing and schnapps.

On the Sunday when Louis Kozlov sponsored the kiddish in honor of his mother's yahrzeit, he recounted her personal history, that of a widow who bought a grocery store to support her family.

He concluded by expressing his gratitude for the chapel fellowship. "You're all such a great bunch of people," he said. "We should be thankful that we have such a group."

His words were echoed by many other congregants, including Nancy Salem, the one woman who attends service regularly. When she began 12 years ago — at the time she was a JCC employee — some of the men resented the presence of a woman, but as they got to know her their acceptance grew quickly, she said.

"There is such warmth and camaraderie from these men. You're greeted every time. When my youngest was bar-mitzvahed Leonard Bernstein held a breakfast.

"At the loss of my parents, he made sure there was a large minyan. They all came to the cemetery and the shivah house. Leonard has always been there for me. He's been the uncle I never had."

Leo Takefman credits Bernstein with keeping the chapel going. David Nemtzov is the cantor, but there's no rabbi. Everyone is encouraged to participate, no matter how well he reads.

Abe Greenstein even made a tape of the service for people who have "forgotten how to daven," he said. "I cut a tape for a man and after three or four weeks he stood up and said the first prayers. I stood in the back and I cried."

Most of the men work out at 6 or 7 a.m. They daven at 8. By 9:30 they're gone, the chapel lights are off and the doors are locked. Only early-birds are aware that the JCC chapel congregation exists.

Doctor helps save Yiddish books

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Seymour (Simkha) Frydrych is a 44-year-old Toronto doctor who makes house calls of a different kind — he picks up old Yiddish books. One winter day, he even brought bread and milk on request to an aged Jewish woman in the Bathurst-Sheppard area, when he stopped in to get a book.

Frydrych, a general practitioner at the Mount Dennis Medical Centre in west Toronto, is a zamler, a collector for the National Yiddish Book Centre in Amherst, Mass., which distributes the volumes to schools and universities.

"I'm happy to do this because I think this is the way Yiddish will be preserved, not as a day-to-day language, but as a reminder of a proud, living language that existed for 900 years."

A son of Holocaust survivors, Henry and Eileen, who live in Toronto, Frydrych said he learned to write and read Yiddish from his parents and from his late grandparents, Max and Esther Rabinowicz, also Holocaust survivors, who lived with his parents.

He and his wife Rochelle have four children who can understand Yiddish and are being taught to read it by Frydrych's parents.

One of the books he picked up was a Yiddish grammar, published in Warsaw in 1908 and never before seen at the Yiddish Book Centre. The grammar, which had been gathering dust in a Toronto attic, has become part of the centre's research library.

Frydrych's zamler partner is Robert Goldenberg of Fort Erie, Ont. The doctor often picks up books in the evening or on weekends when Goldenberg can't make it to Toronto, and the latter sees that they get to Amherst.

Frydrych, a Thornhill resident, invites calls to his office, 416-763-1171, from anyone who wants their Yiddish books to get a new life.

Age fails to slow 90-year-old Goldberg

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — With a father who walked to synagogue until he was 101 years old, it is no wonder that Sam (Sender) Goldberg feels spry at 90.

"Keep busy," is Goldberg's simple credo for a long life. "Until recently I walked four or five miles every day and delivered Meals on Wheels. Family is also important; without it you're a nobody," said Goldberg, whose wife Freda (Bobi) died about nine years ago.

When he arrived in Canada from Poland in 1919, Goldberg remembers harder yet conversely, better times. "When we came to Canada there were no rich immigrants. Sixty percent of us had no indoor facilities and we had to take showers at public stalls in order to get hot water. Of course, we never saw cars. We were happy though; we didn't know any better.

"People today are out of wack, I think. They need huge houses, fancy cars — so many have become show-offs. We were happy to take a walk after work and meet with our friends. We were satisfied with what we had. Today, there are too many expenses — cars, boats — and with all that they are not as happy as we were."

Anti-Semitism was far more virulent when he was young, however, Goldberg concedes.

"In 1947, I bought a small cottage in Keswick for $2,950. My wife was happy to spend summers there with our two daughters and our son. When my nephew wanted to buy a cottage there, however, he was told his children would not be safe on the beach. We were later told it was all right for us to be the only Jews in the community, but they were afraid of too many Jews moving in. Of course, we moved out. I became afraid for my children."

With a smile, he talks about his stint as the first person in Toronto to fight city hall. "We owned a stationery store at Dundas and Shumack streets and after six years, the city wanted to tear it down to make room for apartments. The bailiffs had to throw me out and I went to court for more money."

Almost 40 years later, things have not changed, his daughter-in-law Tzippy Goldberg laughs. Even after he bought the condominium where he now lives alone, he did not have the heart to move out of house in which he had lived with his wife for many years."

Jews unable to deal with success: Dershowitz

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jewish continuity today is threatened not by outside forces, but by Jews unable to deal with their success in society, asserts Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz.

"We have to accept the possibility that we are entering a time when we are not threatened," he said, echoing the warning of philosopher Jean-Paul Sartre that "without enemies there are no Jews."

Some Jews are abandoning Judaism, Dershowitz said, "because they are negative Jews. They fought without knowing what they fought for."

Jews must replace negative Judaism with positive Judaism, he said. "We must be Jews not out of guilt, but because of [Judaism's] positive values."

Dershowitz was the keynote speaker at Aish HaTorah's Evening of Jewish Pride, which honored Ed and Fran Sonshine. Over 1,000 people attended the event, held at Le Parc in Thornhill.

While acknowledging that there is still anti-Semitism "in Russia, Romania, even in my country and in yours," it is "marginalized," Dershowitz said, not supported by the state, the mainstream population or the church.

"We have never been wealthier, or less subjected to persecution. Being a Jew does not disqualify you from success — even university presidents, including the president of Harvard University, are Jews.

"Look at [Natan] Sharansky — the Jews of silence are now free and serving in the Knesset."

The greatest danger, he said, is a lack of understanding and pride in our heritage.

"America has been good to the Jews, but the Jews have been so good for America and Canada. We have more than paid our way. We are full-fledged citizens of the countries we helped build."

Never reject the claim that we contributed disproportionately, he said. "Don't deny the accusation that we control Hollywood — we earned it, by the sweat of our brows and by playing by the rules."

Jews have reached the point where we can lead "free, open and successful lives. The nightmare is that as a result, so many will choose not to follow the traditions of Judaism."

He slammed the results of a survey of university students that said many would not insist on choosing a Jewish spouse.

"We have to understand it would be unthinkable to share our lives with someone who does not share our values."

Alan Dershowitz

Monies raised at the gala event will be used for the Sonshine Jerusalem Fellowship Program, the Canadian component of Aish HaTorah's popular Jerusalem Fellowships, which send university-aged students from all over the world to study at Aish HaTorah in Israel and to develop leadership skills and training there.

Former Jerusalem fellows Elana Carr and Marc Terris spoke of the pride and passion for Judaism that they developed through their experiences in the program.

In an interview, Ed Sonshine, a lawyer, businessman and philanthropist, told The CJN why he and his wife Fran, who is an active communal worker and a recent president of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO, chose this method of contributing, rather than a building.

"Education is the greatest thing. My father, a Holocaust survivor, told me that it is the only thing that 'they' can't take away from you."

One thing that attracted him to Aish HaTorah, he said, is "their bedrock belief that if you make people understand [Judaism], they will like it."

Rabbi Noah Weinberg, founding dean of Aish HaTorah, praised the parents of the Sonshines, all four of whom were Holocaust survivors, saying they "didn't look for revenge — they looked to build, and they built such beautiful children, concerned for the future, and filled with Jewish pride."

Allan Silber, chair of the organization's 1996 fundraising campaign, said this has been "the best campaign ever."

Musical entertainment was by Shlomo Simcha, accompanied by the Zemer Orchestra, and by the Netivot HaTorah Day School Choir. Master of ceremonies was Paul Godfrey.

Academics examine Jewish studies

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The first-ever national conference on Canadian Jewish studies organized by Montreal's Concordia and Toronto's York universities was historic by mere virtue of the fact that it took place, organizers said.

It was billed as an opportunity for Canadian scholars to have "their own forum in which to exchange ideas."

But a consensus also emerging from the two-day event, partially funded by Heritage Canada, was that the conference by and large lived up to its billing and helped set the stage for a second session at York in the spring of 1998.

"We set up this conference as a chance to map out the major news and research work in Jewish studies," said Concordia's Prof. Michael Oppenheim, one of the local organizers with colleagues Ira Robinson, Norma Joseph and Frank Chalk.

"This will allow academics in their respective fields to identify what resources exist throughout Canada and excite people into seeing what others are doing."

The two days of talks seemed to offer something for everybody — ranging from the most recent Canadian-Jewish Holocaust research to one field Oppenheim said was gaining popularity within Jewish studies programs — women's studies.

One paper delivered by Reena Zeidman of Queens University, for example, focused on Lesbianism in Halachic Discourse.

Other more well-worn topics included The Jewishness of the Jewish State.

In an interview, Oppenheim acknowledged that the conference theme — A Heritage in Transition: Jewish Studies in Canada — had nothing to do, as some might have thought, with the actual state of health of Jewish studies across Canada.

While that's an issue that will hopefully be addressed at the next conference, Oppenheim said, Jewish studies are generally thriving, especially compared to only 30 years ago, when those departments simply did not exist.

At Concordia, for example, Oppenheim said there are now four full-time Jewish studies professors within the Department of Religion and the number of classes has increased yearly.

Michael Brown, director of York's Centre for Jewish Studies, said decades ago, such programs were offered on the university curriculum as "handmaiden study" to courses on Christianity.

Jewish studies at Concordia and York were bolstered significantly in 1993 with the endowment of a Chair in Canadian Jewish Studies by Multiculturalism Canada (now the Department of Canadian Heritage).

That Chair at the two universities hosted the Montreal conference and is helping to pay for new research, a "community outreach" advisory board and future endowed professorship at Concordia.

At York, the Chair is serving to enhance the activities of the Centre for Jewish Studies, which also holds undergraduate and graduate classes, conducts research and performs its own "outreach" to religious and community groups.

Internet anti-racist a hit with students

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Clad in blue jeans and sweater, sleeves pushed up, his long wavy hair falling to his shoulders, British Columbia-based Internet anti-racism crusader Ken McVay, looked, as he himself told the approximately 400 high school students, "like an old hippie on a bad hair day."

The students assembled last month in a McMaster University lecture theatre for Hamilton's third annual Holocaust Education Seminar.

It made for instant rapport with McVay's young audience, as he spoke to them in their own language about the racist statements, neo-Nazi propaganda and Holocaust denial they might encounter on the Internet.

Students and teachers alike were impressed with McVay, and one teacher commented, "He obviously got through to them."

Using quotes from various hatemongers, McVay demolished their statements one by one, often pointing out their absurdity and at the same time, cautioning the students to question such statements.

Their purpose is to sow hatred, McVay said. "Remember that, the next time the Heritage Front stands outside your school recruiting. You need to develop a mindset that questions everything.

McVay reminded the students that the Holocaust has been irrefutably documented, even by the Germans themselves.

He called Holocaust denial "Hitler cleansing" and "making Hitler respectable," adding, "I want to teach you to have contempt for the lies of [Toronto pro-Nazi publisher] Ernst Zundel."

JIAS changes give more control to communities

By DAVID LAZARUS
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) of Canada is in the process of devolving into a structure run more directly by local communities.

Behind the plan, more than a year in the making, is a desire to make JIAS a more efficient and grassroots oriented organization.

But the restructuring also raised initial concerns among some national lay leadership and front-line staff that increased federation influence over JIAS would undermine its autonomy, as well as threaten JIAS jobs and more fundamentally, services to immigrants and refugees.

Those worries, however, appear to have been assuaged by a new model of service coming into effect locally July 1:

A "Welcome Centre" staffed by workers of JIAS, the Jewish Education Council, Jewish Vocational Service, Jewish Family Services/Baron de Hirsch, the YM-YWHA, and other relevant agencies, as a means to provide a holistic, more integrated, and "seamless service" approach to processing and integrating immigrants and refugees.

"This will mean getting a bigger bang for the buck," said Montreal JIAS director Joel Moss. "The staff will work together and form one staff team, a continuum of services."

Plans also are to locate the Welcome Centre, whose planning committee was chaired by Laya Feldman, outside Cummings House to make it more approachable for new arrivals.

The Welcome Centre's provisional board of directors, which supersedes the Council of JIAS Montreal as of July 1, will include representation by JIAS, FEDERATION CJA, immigrants and relevant Jewish agencies.

Just how increased local control of JIAS — a simiar process is also taking place in Toronto — will affect its national scope of activities remains to be seen. At the very least JIAS national would continue its advocacy mandate on behalf of immigrants and refugees.

But Moss did acknowledge that the JIAS restructuring could result in direct funding of local JIAS activities by Federation CJA — rather than by its traditional funder, CJF Canada — although this has not been finalized.

As well, like other national and local Jewish bodies, JIAS is undergoing budget cuts: eight percent for '96-'97 nationally, and six percent in Montreal.

While JIAS staffers have been assured they'll keep their jobs with the new restructuring and budget cuts, there are no guarantees that this will remain the case indefinitely.

Moss said the cuts would most likely affect services, such as "financial assistance programs" for some new immigrants, who will instead be able to make use of low-interest JIAS loan programs requiring eventual repayment.

According to outgoing JIAS president Robert Kleinman (who has been succeeded by Adrian Albert of Edmonton), there is little question that the JIAS restructuring will give FEDERATION CJA more say into JIAS affairs, but the bottom line is that "it will improve services to immgrants" and make JIAS more directly "answerable" to the community it serves.

Ber Lazarus, a JIAS front-line worker (he is an intake/volunteer program coordinator) who sat in on most of the meetings involved in the restructuring, has overcome initial concerns, saying "it seems everyone is more or less on board."

Still, he suggested that only time will tell if the new Welcome Centre operates as "seamlessly" as it is hoped.

Filmon visits Israel

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It was the opportunity of a lifetime, says Manitoba Premier Gary Filmon of his first visit to Israel last month.

Filmon, the 1996 Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner honoree and his wife Janice were among 1,000 people who participated in the JNF mega-tour May 8 to 20 in celebration of Jerusalem's 3,000th birthday.

Filmon says he was excited about seeing the places associated with the birthplace of three of the world's major religions, as well as the sites of some of mankind's earliest recorded history.

"Israel has such a diverse geography in such a small land mass," he says. "We travelled from the Golan Heights to the Negev Desert to the Mediterranean Sea. I was struck by the tremendous transformation of desert and semi-arid wasteland to productive and green agricultural land."

With his engineering background, Filmon was particularly interested in the tours of water management systems and reservoirs. "I have never seen anything like them before," he recalls.

The tour included stops in Tel Aviv, Tiberius and the Sea of Galilee, the Jordan Valley and Jerusalem, where the visitors went to the Western Wall and Yad Vashem. They also went to Bethlehem's Manger Square and Masada.

As a politician, Filmon took a special interest in the Israeli political campaign. He was struck by the fact that unlike Canada, the state of the economy was not an issue at all. The Israeli economy, he noted, has been registering double digit growth rates. Over one-million people have been absorbed since 1990 and the unemployment rate has decreased from 10 percent to 7.5 percent.

Filmon said he would love to return to Israel again one day, it's hoped, with his children.

Children's Choir sings poems from Theresienstadt

By MOURÁ WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — Out of Ashes, a work for children's choir based on four poems by Theresienstadt child survivor Inge Auerbacher, had its premiere performance here recently at a concert commemorating the liberation of the death camps and the 20th anniversary of the Hamilton Children's Choir.

At the work's conclusion, the overflow audience at Christ's Church Cathedral rose to a standing ovation. Most, said choir artistic director David Davis afterwards, "were in tears."

Set for choir, oboe, synthesizer, percussion and shofar, Out of Ashes is the work of Ancaster composer Robert Rivers. It was specially commissioned for the 40-voice choir by Davis, who had been searching for poetry about the Holocaust suitable for children — and which could be set to music — when he came across I Am A Star.

Auerbacher spent three years in Theresienstadt from age seven to 10 with her parents, who also survived. Her second book, Beyond The Yellow Star To America, also for children, has just been published in Canada by Royal Fireworks Press of Downsview.

Overwhelmed by music, performance

Now living in Jamaica, N.Y., she was in Hamilton for the premiere and a rehearsal.

She was "overwhelmed" by both the music and the children's sensitive performance, she told The CJN.

The composer "has captured the spirit extremely well. It really honors the 1½ million children [killed in the Holocaust]."

Before starting on his commission, Rivers consulted with both Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz of Temple Beth Sholom, who pre-recorded the sound of the shofar, heard to stunning effect at one point in the work, and with Dr. Nadia Rosa, also a Theresienstadt child survivor and co-chair of the local Yom Hashoah committee.

The piece has been recorded and will be available on CD. For more information, contact the Hamilton Children's Choir, 252 James St. N., Hamilton, Ont. L8R 2L3.

The choir has been invited to sing at Carnegie Hall in New York, where "we will definitely perform Out Of Ashes," Davis said. The piece will also be the main work during the choir's tour of the Maritimes this summer.

Winnipeg BJE names new education director

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Corresondent

WINNIPEG — A longtime Winnipeg educator has been appointed the new director of education of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (BJE).

For the past 20 years, Jack Solomon has been a vice principal and principal in Winnipeg School Division No. 1 schools. He assumes his new duties, replacing Dr. Arnold Carmel, on July 1.

Solomon says he's excited about the challenges the next three years present. The most significant challenge, he notes, will be the transition from the existing BJE schools to the new campus, which opens in south Winnipeg in September, 1997.

"From what I have heard, there is some concern in the north end about retaining a Jewish presence there," he says. "The board is trying to address that problem."

Solomon sees himself first and foremost as an educator. Although his background is secular, he is well aware of the importance of a Jewish education.

"The combination of Jewish and general studies experiences is what makes our Jewish school system unique.

"I recognize that within our community are those who observe an Orthodox tradition and those who are more secular. We want our schools to be as open as we can to all elements of the community. We are morally obligated to position ourselves so that we can educate as many Jewish children as possible."

Solomon notes that he comes to his new role with no ties to any particular interest groups. He says he's hoping his experience in the public school system will benefit the BJE.

Toronto doctor performs new heart surgery technique

By JUDY SIEGEL
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – A 44-year-old man with a defective aortal valve became the first local patient to undergo extremely complicated open-heart surgery, adapting his own pulmonary valve in its place and implanting a new pulmonary valve from a donor.

The operation was performed by Prof. Tirone David of Toronto, regarded as one of the world's leading heart surgeons, as part of an international symposium on cardiology and cardiothoracic surgery in Jerusalem.

The unusual surgery was carried out in Shaare Zedek hospital and viewed via closed-circuit video by hundreds of doctors and nurses from around the country.

David calmly answered questions from a panel of physicians, and even joked during the three-hour operation, as he moulded and secured the valve tissue, using hundreds of sutures. The patient's heart was restarted with an electric shock after his body was kept alive on a heart-lung machine.

David praised a senior Shaare Zedek scrub nurse, who seemed to anticipate his every move, even though such surgery had never been performed in the hospital before.

Meanwhile, a new U.S. technique for saving the lives of inoperable heart patients based on the anatomy of reptiles, which have no blood vessels was presented in a lecture. The method, developed by Prof. Alex Zapolansky, of San Francisco, involves the drilling into the cardiac muscle with lasers to supply it with blood.

The laser is used to tunnel into the heart muscle and infuse it with blood, instead of trying to repair the patients' coronary arteries, which are close to useless. Zapolansky said he had performed the procedure on 200 inoperable patients, and that their quality of life has much improved.

Hundreds of cardiologists and cardiothoracic surgeons from around the country, as well as guests from Egypt, Jordan, the autonomous areas, North America, Europe, Turkey and Panama attended the two-day symposium.

Shaare Zedek campaign proves successful

TORONTO — Over 300 people recently crowded into the garden of Michael and Barbara Bregman's Forest Hill home to join in the tribute being paid to his parents, Lou and Yetta Bregman, by the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation.

The event was the culmination of several months of campaigning to establish the Lou and Yetta Bregman Fund in Neonatal Intensive Care at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre, Jerusalem.

The fund was originally established in order to purchase state-of-the-art intensive care stations for the treatment of at-risk newborns, said Bernie Abrams, the foundation's national president. However, he said, the campaign was so successful that it exceeded its original goal and sufficient monies have been raised to endow the Woman and Infant Operating Theatre in the Bregmans' name instead.

This facility will be part of the comprehensive Woman and Infant Centre currently under construction at Shaare Zedek. Slated to be completed within a year, the centre will incorporate all services for newborns and for women of all ages, including maternity, gynecology, gynecological oncology and in-vitro fertilization.

Social work centre planned for Baycrest

TORONTO — A $3-million gift to the Baycrest Campaign from Ben and Hilda Katz will be used to create the first Centre for Gerontological Social Work of its kind.

A collaboration between the Faculty of Social Work at the University of Toronto and Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the new centre will research and provide education and training opportunities for doctoral and post-doctoral social work students at a level that meets internationally recognized standards of excellence.

The establishment of a new Chair in Gerontological Social Work was also announced. This is a joint position of the faculty of Social Work and Baycrest and will be an integral part of the Centre for Gerontological Social Work.

Reflections and Gratitude

The end of the current school year will shortly be upon us. For Eitz Chaim Schools, this will mark the completion of 80 years of educational services to the Toronto Jewish Community.

Looking back, it is interesting and instructive to reflect upon the many changes and development that have unfolded in the Jewish community since we opened: two world wars, a devastating holocaust, the creation of the State of Israel, an acculturalization process to North American society, a struggle to maintain Jewish identity in an increasingly open and assimilative environment, and the challenge to perpetuate in this context the religious precepts, values, ideals and lifestyle of our historical commitment to Torah Observant Judaism.

These changes have been massive and rapid, and have tended to destabilize the Jewish home and society. They have highlighted more than ever the role of tradition and intensive Jewish education and knowledge in meaningful Jewish life.

For over 3,000 years, a commitment to intensive and lifelong Jewish education and study has been one of the foremost religious and cultural imperative of our faith and peoplehood. It has earned for us the sobriquet "the people of the book" and has contributed significantly to our dynamism and durability. It has been and continues to be a prime contributor to Jewish continuity, and has always constituted a core objective of our school during its 80 years of existence.

We at Eitz Chaim are proud that thousands of our graduates have carried into their adult lives the skills and commitment necessary to implement Torah observance, Jewish learning and Jewish community services as a lifelong process.

We at Eitz Chaim also recognize that the success of any educational institution is a direct function of the quality and effectiveness of its principals, teachers and support staff. While lay leadership is important to provide impetus, financial wherewithal and underlying philosophical orientation, our society has in the main ceded the obligation and daunting task of formal Jewish education to professional educators.

We therefore publicly express our deep gratitude and debt to our principals, Rebbeim, teachers and staff, past and present. The Board, parents, graduates, 1,100 students and the many supporters of Eitz Chaim Schools thank them for their professionalism, dedication, care, concern and ever increasing success. YeYasher Kochachem.

Netanyahu not intimidated by Arab threats

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Israeli Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu has declared that Arab threats would not affect the way his government pursues the peace process.

"We are not impressed by various declarations of [Arab] leaders, nor do threats intimidate us. In fact, they have an opposite effect," Netanyahu said last week.

Netanyahu made his comments as Arab leaders planned to convene in Cairo to discuss the right-wing leader's election and its impact on the peace process. Several participants have already expressed concern that the incoming Israeli government would take steps to hinder the continuation of the peace process.

While Netanyahu has pledged to continue the peace process, in particular negotiations with the Palestinians, he has indicated that he will take a more hard-line stand than the outgoing government of Shimon Peres.

The top priority in any peace accords his government pursues will be security, Netanyahu said.

"The supreme test of any agreement we make, and any agreement that has been made, will be security," Netanyahu said, adding, "There will be no compromise on this issue."

Meanwhile, Netanyahu said he still expects to present his government for Knesset approval within the next week.

As negotiations to form a coalition continue, Netanyahu's Likud Party and the National Religious Party (NRP), which won nine seats in the elections, reportedly reached agreement last Thursday on ministerial appointments.

Under the agreement, the religious Zionist party would head up the Education Ministry, as well as the Transport and Energy portfolios that are to be combined into one ministry, according to Israeli news reports.

The Likud-NRP accord also called for rotating the Religious Affairs portfolio between the NRP and Shas, the Orthodox Sephardi party, which won 10 Knesset seats.

Likud continued to negotiate with other potential coalition partners, including Tsomet, The Third Way and Yisrael b'Aliyah.

But Yisrael b'Aliyah leader Natan Sharansky was reported to have rejected a Likud offer for the Industry and Trade portfolio, along with two deputy ministers in the ministries of Absorption and Education.

Sharansky was quoted as saying that he was committed to bringing social change, but could not do that with those appointments.

Jerusalem key to peace: PLO

By BILL HUTMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – If Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu removes the question of Jerusalem from negotiations with the Palestinians, it will likely mean an end to the peace process, Faisal Husseini, the senior PLO official in Jerusalem, told foreign diplomats at Orient House last week.

"The Orient House is the centre for peace in this area," he said. "Closing Orient House means closing the negotiations."

Representatives of the consulates of the United States, France, Italy, Turkey, Sweden, Greece, Spain, the Red Cross and the United Nations attended the meeting, which Husseini described as "a regular meeting to brief them about the peace process and the situation in Jerusalem."

Several of the foreign diplomats said Husseini was very forceful about Palestinian insistence that Israel seriously enter negotiations on the future of Jerusalem as called for in the Oslo accords, or face a collapse of the peace process.

"If someone will say no negotiations on Jerusalem, that Jerusalem is not part of this agreement, I don't believe this peace process will have any chance," Husseini told reporters after the meeting.

He also warned of the ill effects that will result if Netanyahu goes through with the threat to close Orient House, the PLO headquarters in the city.

Husseini said despite his concerns over Netanyahu's plans, he is guardedly optimistic that, in the end, the new government would move ahead with the peace talks.

"Anyone who listened to Mr. Netanyahu the candidate must be worried," he said. "But listening [to him after he was elected], we have heard something else. There is hope."

Palestinian gunman sought

JERUSALEM – Security forces continued their search for the Palestinian gunman who killed an off-duty Israeli police officer and wounded his wife in a shooting last week in the West Bank village of Bidya.

The attack was the second in two weeks that Israeli officials suspect was carried out by Palestinian gunmen.

In the attack, Meir Alush, his wife, Nitza, and their son, about 18 months old, had stopped at a toy store in Bidya, a village that straddles the trans-Samaria highway.

The child was not hurt.

Military agreements thrown into jeopardy

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Ordinarily, the fall of a government in Turkey barely evokes a ripple of concern or interest in Israel. But the resignation of Turkey's prime minister, Mesmut Yilmaz, on June 6 was anything but a blase piece of news to informed Israelis.

A day after Yilmaz stepped down, the Turkish president, Suleyman Demirel, once again asked the leader of the pro-Islamic Welfare party, Necmettin Erbakan, to try to cobble together a government.

In last December's general election, the Welfare party, which has grown increasingly popular in recent years, won a plurality in parliament. At Demirel's behest, Erbakan attempted to form a government. When he failed, Yilmaz and his bitter rival, Tansu Ciller, stitched together a shaky right-of-centre coalition and thus staved off an Islamic regime.

Now Erbakan has been given another chance, and if he succeeds, Turkey — a staunchly secular country whose population is overwhelmingly Muslim — will get its first Islamic administration since the rise of the modern Turkish state in the 1920s.

If Erbakan's party takes over, Israel's strategic relationship with Turkey, bolstered of late by a series of unprecedented military agreements, will be imperilled. Cognizant of this possibility, Israel's president, Ezer Weizman, conferred with Demirel in Turkey last week.

The military co-operation accords were signed last February by the director-general of Israel's Ministry of Defence, David Ivry, and Turkey's deputy chief of staff, Gen. Cevik Bir. A month later, during Demirel's visit to Israel — the first by a Turkish president — the pacts were formally ratified.

Vehemently opposed by the Welfare party, these agreements came on the heels of an exchange of high-level visits by Israeli and Turkish personalities.

In the wake of the 1993 Declaration of Principles signed by Israel and the PLO, Turkey's foreign minister visited Jerusalem. Subsequently, Ezer Weizman turned up in Ankara, and Tansu Ciller, the prime minister of Turkey, visited Israel.

As a result of these meetings, largely made possible by Israel's rapprochement with the PLO, Israel and Turkey upgraded their political, economic and defence ties. Israel had always sought close links with Turkey, the first Muslim nation to establish diplomatic relations with Jerusalem and still the only Muslim member of the NATO alliance.

But Turkey, eager to cultivate the Arab world, was never as eager and kept Israel at arm's length. Indeed, during the 1980s, Turkey downgraded its relations with Israel. However, with the Oslo peace agreements and with the end of Israel's isolation in the region, Turkey modified its position toward Israel.

Under the terms of Israel's military compact with Turkey, the two countries will conduct a security dialogue, share intelligence data and carry out joint air, sea and land exercises. Furthermore, Israel will renovate Turkey's fleet of Phantom jets and the Israeli Air Force will be permitted to train in Turkish air space several times annually.

As expected, the agreements have been excoriated by Turkish Islamic fundamentalists, by Arab countries and by Iran.

Last month, a lone gunman, upset with the treaties, attempted to assassinate Demirel. Taking his cue from this incident, Erbakan, referring to Israel's two-week bombardment of Lebanon in April, chided the government for entering into agreements with "Jews who bomb our Muslim brothers."

Stung by his denunciation, Yilmaz reportedly suggested that Turkey might reassess its contractual obligations to Israel. Yet within days of his alleged remark, the vice-admiral of Turkey's navy arrived in Israel as scheduled, the Turkish Foreign Ministry denied that Turkey was getting cold feet and Turkish Foreign Minister Emre Gonensay expressed unequivocal support for the arrangements.

Arab states, predictably, have poured scorn on Turkey's new relations with Israel. On June 9, Syria, Egypt and Saudi Arabia urged Turkey to reconsider its agreements with Israel. Iran, a non-Arab Islamic state, has attacked the accords in the most vociferous terms.

Despite the fierce criticism, Turkey is holding fast. Gonensay has stoutly defended Turkey's policy, saying it is in Turkey's best interests. And Turkey's ambassador in Tel Aviv has said, "We don't want to deal with Israel behind closed doors any more."

Turkey has sound reasons for cozying up to Israel. Turkey is at odds with Syria over water resources, borders and Damascus' overt backing of Kurdish rebels. And, of course, Turkey is extremely wary of Islamic fundamentalism of the kind espoused by Iran.

But if the Welfare party vaults into power, Israel's solemn agreements, and its very friendship, with Turkey will be thrown into dire jeopardy, creating an immediate challenge to Benjamin Netanyahu, the incoming prime minister of Israel.

June 10

• Five Israeli soldiers were killed and eight wounded, three seriously, in a Hezbollah attack in southern Lebanon. The attack was the deadliest in the area since a U.S. brokered cease-fire two months ago halted cross-border fighting between the two groups. The five soldiers were Lt. Lior Ramon, 21; Lt. Yishai Shechter, 21; Staff-Sgt. Gavriel Idan, 20; Staff-Sgt. Amir Ben-Moshe, 21; Sgt. Yaniv Roimi, 21.

June 11

• Jerusalem mayor and potential cabinet minister Ehud Olmert will face charges in connection with a financial scandal in 1988, when he served as treasurer of the Likud party. Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair decided to prosecute Olmert for suspected involvement in creating false receipts and other misdeeds during the party's election campaign that year.

June 13

• The head of the Palestinian security force denied reports that some of its senior members threatened to stop the crackdown on Hamas if the peace process did not move forward. Jibril Rajoub said the Palestinian security service was continuing the policy established before the Israeli elections.

• Officials close to Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu said he hoped to present his new government to the Knesset within the week. The Likud leader held talks with heads of the parties with which he is negotiating.

June 16

• An Arab gunman shot and killed an off-duty Israeli police officer and wounded his wife in the West Bank village of Bidya. The youth fled from the scene of the attack, the second in two weeks that Israeli officials suspect was carried out by Palestinian gunmen.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

• Five hundred people plan to attend the World Zionist Organization General Council from June 17 to 20.

Coalition deals pave way to new government

Foreign Affairs, Mordechai (a high-ranking general) for Defence and Meridor, the most likely candidate for Finance – suggests a pragmatic policy intended, in part, to reassure the international community of the government's moderation.

The guidelines of the new government – which are to be signed by all coalition partners – call for unconditional negotiations with Syria, but insist on Israeli sovereignty over the Golan; favor Palestinian self-rule but reject an independent state; and make continued negotiations conditional on the Palestinian Authorities' (PA) fulfilment of all the PA's previous commitments. There is no mention of Israeli adherance to commitments of the previous government concerning the Oslo accords.

The guidelines state that the government will guarantee the existence and security of Jewish settlements, including their link to the State of Israel, but say nothing about expansion.

In religious matters, the guidelines promise to make all conversions performed in Israel subject to the approval of the Chief Rabbinate. The proposed change is intended to counteract a recent Supreme Court decision which requires the state to recognize Reform and Conservative conversions performed in Israel.

The government guidelines will effectively prevent that, thereby placating the religious parties whose members stridently oppose Reform and Conservative conversions. (The status of Israeli Jews who converted abroad will not be affected.)

The government also undertakes to maintain the status quo in religious affairs, promising to look into necessary legislation to restore the status quo if it has indeed changed. (There is no mention of which status quo.)

Part of the agreement with UTJ calls for not offending religious Jews in areas where they form a residential majority. Analysts say that could lead to the closing of some streets on Shabbat.

The coalition guidelines also give the government two weeks to pass the controversial "Norwegian law," which would require all ministers (except for the prime minister and his deputy) to resign their Knesset seats and serve solely as cabinet ministers. The seats would then be filled by other party members. The law, which would bring in 16 additional MKs, has been criticized as an unnecessary public expense.

Netanyahu, who has 45 days (until the end of July) to form a government, had promised to set one up by the opening of the 14th Knesset on June 17, but missed that deadline.

Israel, Turkey reaffirm military pact

The party's leader, Necmettin Erbakan, has been a vocal critic of the military accord, though in recent days, as he confronts the chance to form a government, he has softened that stance.

During his visit, Weizman also addressed a UN-sponsored international conference on the future of the world's cities.

The Israeli president used his speech before the Habitat II Conference to offer a reassurance that Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu would pursue the peace process, despite some of his hardline comments during the election campaign.

"The commitment of Israel, its people and its leaders, in the past, the present and the future, to the attainment of peace, is unshakable," he said.

In his meeting with Demirel, Weizman conveyed a message from Netanyahu, in which the incoming prime minister underscored his commitment to attaining regional peace and to strengthening Israeli-Turkish ties.

In a separate development, Arab representatives of non-governmental organizations (NGO) at the Habitat II Conference promoted Jerusalem as an Arab and Islamic entity.

The Islamic Congress for Jerusalem, based in Amman, Jordan, and the Palestinian Authority were among the Arab groups with delegates at the June 3 to 7 NGO forum.

Housing in the West Bank was discussed at several sessions, and the Israeli government was condemned for destroying homes of suspected terrorists, said Harris Schoenberg, director of UN affairs for B'nai B'rith, who attended the meeting.

Criticism of Israel has been a typical feature of the non-governmental gatherings that run parallel to the governmental portions of UN conferences.

Anti-Israel feelings were evident at the last such UN gathering, the conference on women held last summer in Beijing.

The Habitat II conference was called to examine how nations could improve the conditions of cities and provide adequate shelter for their populations.

Nearly half of the world's population live in cities and it is estimated that more than two-thirds will inhabit cities by the year 2015.

Although housing traditionally has not been a Jewish issue, participation in the conference is important because "as a community, we must also be vocal on issues related to humankind," said Schoenberg.

He added that a Jewish presence at such international gatherings is also necessary to build coalitions with other groups.

A Jewish presence at this particular conference demonstrated solidarity with Turkish Jewry at a time when anti-Semitism is on the rise here and the Welfare Movement is seeking to form the next government, he said.

JTA correspondents Naomi Segal in Jerusalem and Deborah Leipziger in London contributed to this report.

Ottawa opposes arrest of Palestinian activist

OTTAWA — Canada has protested the arrest of a prominent Palestinian human rights activist and suggested the incident could affect Ottawa's aid to the Palestinian Authority (PA).

Dr. Eyad Sarraj, a psychiatrist who leads the Independent Commission on Citizens' Rights and heads the Gaza Mental Health Program, was arrested earlier this month. Reports said he was charged with assaulting a police officer and possibly, with possession of drugs.

This was Sarraj's third arrest in six months for speaking out against Yasser Arafat's government. In a recent New York Times interview, Sarraj called the PA "corrupt, dictatorial and oppressive," and said he was "100 times" freer during Israel's occupation.

In a letter to Arafat, Canada's ambassador to Israel, David Berger, protested Sarraj's arrest, and embassy official Louis Simard made Ottawa's views known at a press conference with the Palestinian leader.

Sarraj's mental health clinic has received funding from the Canadian International Development Agency (CIDA) and from the Ministry of Health.

Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy told reporters last week that Sarraj's arrest could affect Canada's $70 million aid package to the PA.

Ministry spokesperson Rodney Moore told The CJN that Canada expects Sarraj to have access to a lawyer and be afforded due process.

"Canada expects the PA to ensure that the right to freedom of opinion and the press is respected," Moore added.

Orthodox rabbis condemn belief in messiah's resurrection

By DEBRA NUSSBAUM COHEN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – An organization representing more than 1,000 mainstream Orthodox rabbis has passed a resolution condemning the belief of many Lubavitch Chassidim that the late Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson is the Messiah.

Members of the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) passed the resolution at its annual convention in Spring Glen, N.Y., on June 12, a week before the second anniversary of the Lubavitcher Rebbe's death.

Some Lubavitchers – no one knows exactly how many – continue to believe that the Rebbe is the Messiah, though he died June 12, 1994 at the age of 92, and few of them are able to describe that event as their leader's death.

Instead, many describe the third day of the month of Tammuz on the Jewish calendar as "the day the Rebbe ascended on high."

Before the Rebbe's death, many Lubavitch Chassidim believed that he was the Messiah and had not yet revealed himself to be the redeemer because the Jewish people did not merit it.

At issue now is the fact that a significant segment of the Lubavitch movement continues to believe – and is publicly promoting that belief – that the Rebbe will be resurrected as the Messiah.

There are also a few members of the messianic camp who believe the Rebbe never died at all, but is simply not yet ready to reappear.

At the same time, other Lubavitchers have acknowledged their beloved leader's death and have dedicated themselves to carrying on his work, reaching out to Jews wherever they may be.

The author of the RCA resolution, Rabbi David Berger, has publicly urged the mainstream Orthodox community to distance itself from the large messianic faction in Lubavitch by not raising money for the chassidic group.

The single-sentence resolution, which was passed by consensus, reads: "In light of disturbing developments which have recently arisen in the Jewish community, the Rabbinical Council of America in convention assembled declares that there is not and has never been a place in Judaism for the belief that Mashiach ben David [Messiah son of David] will begin his Messianic Mission only to experience death, burial and resurrection before completing it."

The resolution does not mention Lubavitch by name, because the RCA's leadership wanted to be careful "not to deprecate or castigate" the entire chassidic group, said RCA president, Rabbi Rafael Grossman.

The original version of the resolution had named Lubavitch, but the reference was taken out in the end, Rabbi Grossman said, because "there is a substantial part of Lubavitch leaders who do not hold this view, and among those who do hold the view, there are some wonderful, dedicated Jews; so it is not our intention to deprecate these people, but to make it clear that this view is not in the Torah tradition."

It is rare for one Orthodox group to publicly criticize another, even if not by name, and the response among both factions of the Lubavitch was strong.

U.S. survivors of Nazi camps can get German compensation

By TOM TUGEND
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LOS ANGELES – American citizens imprisoned in Nazi concentration camps can seek restitution from the German government through a new U.S. government program.

"It is essential that those who suffered at the hands of the Nazis receive reparations for what they lost," said U.S. Attorney General Janet Reno, who announced the program June 13 at the Simon Wiesenthal Centre here. "We can't calculate their loss in mere money, but we can seek to redress their losses."

The Holocaust Claims Program is an outgrowth of the case of Hugo Princz, who battled the German and U.S. governments for 40 years to obtain reparations for the 38 months he was held in Treblinka, Auschwitz and Dachau. His parents and six siblings died in the camps.

Princz, now 73, was born to a naturalized American businessman in what is now Slovakia, making him a U.S. citizen at birth. Although the family had American passports, they were imprisoned by the Nazis.

In September 1995, the United States and Germany signed an agreement under which Princz and 10 other American survivors shared a one-time payment of $2.1 million from the German government.

The new program gives other U.S. survivors of the Holocaust until Sept. 30 to file claims with the U.S. Justice Department's Foreign Claims Settlement Commission.

TRIBUTE TO ISRAEL

Site is the traditional burial place of King David

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Like many holy sites in Israel, the Cenacle and adjoining Tomb of David, on Jerusalem's Mount Zion near the Zion Gate, are sacred to multiple denominations of three world religions. A tradition persists that this is the burial place of King David, the legendary Hebrew monarch whose fateful arrival in the city 3,000 years ago is currently being celebrated in a wide range of Jerusalem 3000 activities throughout the land.

Tradition also has it that numerous other Hebrew kings were buried here, and that a large room upstairs was the location of Jesus' Last Supper -- actually a Passover seder.

Before 1967, many Jews would come here to pay homage to King David, even while faced with convincing scriptural evidence from the first Book of Kings that David was actually buried east of here, within the walls of his own city.

One wanders through several rooms and halls, eventually arriving at a small chamber that houses a stone tomb, over which a curtain with Hebrew lettering has been draped. The tomb is fenced off by a metal rail. The chamber is actually an antechamber to a slightly larger room that was once a mosque.

Until the Six Day War, the Tomb of David was perhaps the most frequently visited Jewish holy place, simply by virtue of its accessibility. Until 1967, the Old City of Jerusalem was part of Jordanian territory and hence off-limits to Jews.

The Cenacle, a building connected with this sacred site, has served at various times throughout the centuries as a mosque, synagogue and a church. Not surprisingly, it reflects a host of architectural styles. It has Turkish elements, is of Crusader construction in part, and contains Roman art, Greek art, and a Hebrew motif in the grapes and vine leaves depicted in the stonework.

Because the old masonry is subject to deterioration over time, the building has been the target of a $3 million (US) restoration in recent years. Lamar Baker, a Christian stone-mason from the Collingwood area north of Toronto, spent nearly three months on the site recently to help with repairs.

Indicating a section of masonry, Baker explained that since only mud was placed between the bricks in olden times, seedlings sprout and grow from the walls, eventually causing serious damage. He has repaired this section of wall using modern techniques and a special cement mix to keep the bricks together for a long time to come.

"It's a great privilege to work on these stones, some of which were put into place thousands of years ago," he said.

A different sort of restorative work must eventually be done on the Zion Gate, which is deeply pockmarked from fierce shelling that occurred here in 1948. The gate, which was built in 1540, forces those who pass through it to change directions as a defensive measure.

Beside the Tomb of David is the Museum of King David, a small and reportedly somewhat eccentric institution connected with a yeshivah. If you're so inclined, you might better spend your time across the street at the Chamber of the Holocaust, the country's first Holocaust museum.

Sephardi shul built in 16th Century

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Why, the astute traveller might wonder, was the 400-year-old Yohanan Ben Zakai Synagogue in Jerusalem's Jewish Quarter designed so that one must descend three metres below street level to reach the main floor?

The answer, as it happens, has more to do with religious chauvinism than with architectural science. The largest and earliest of four adjoining Sephardi synagogues in the Jewish Quarter, the shul was built in the 16th century by Jews who had been expelled from Spain.

Its construction was subject to Ottoman regulations that required a Jewish place of worship to be lower to the earth than a mosque, and no closer to heaven than any neighboring building.

Unfortunately, there's an even more striking example of religious disrespect associated with this historic complex of synagogues. After the renascent state of Israel lost the Old City of Jerusalem to the Jordanians in 1948, the synagogues were further damaged, then looted and – the ultimate degradation – used by the Jordanians as garbage dumps and pens for sheep.

"This is what we came back to," Gorodesky announces gruffly, as if the destruction happened just yesterday. "I couldn't believe it when I walked back into this rubble! Just think what would happen if we ever did that to a mosque! Boy! We'd have the whole world down on us!"

The main synagogue was named after Rabbi Yohanan Ben Zakai, who, according to tradition, taught his pupils in a Beit Hamidrash on this spot in the first century of the Common Era. The second synagogue, named after the prophet Eliyahu, possesses an ancient chair which Eliyahu was said to have used and a marriage canopy which the exiles had brought from Spain. .

The third synagogue, known as the Istamboli, once was the focal point for a congregation of Turkish Jews, while the fourth and smallest, known as the Emtzai or Central Synagogue, was supposedly the most extravagantly decorated before its destruction.

According to Gorodesky, soldiers of the Israeli Haganah hid in the Holy Ark of the main synagogue while fighting the Jordanians in 1948. As the Old City fell, the soldiers were killed or became prisoners of war.

In as many aspects as possible, the restoration was faithful to the design and spirit of the originals. Holy arks, pulpits and candelabrum were brought from Italy, Turkey and Gibraltar to replace the old ritual articles. Gorodesky credits the superb reconstruction to the good sense of Teddy Kollek, Jerusalem's renowned former mayor, and to the financial largesse of donors such as the Rothschilds and the Joseph Katz family of Pittsburg.

From the outside, the complex presents a modest appearance. Inside, one gets a sense of spaciousness and clean design, if not grandness. One notes trademark elements of Byzantine and Muslim architecture such as the Moorish-style "camel-back" windows and gothic arches and vaults that are purposely assymmetrical to avoid the suggestion of a cross.

Gorodesky leads the visitor back to the main synagogue, where workers are erecting a chupah – a marriage canopy – and decorating it with vine leaves. In a few hours, a couple from Australia will be getting married here, he explains.

The synagogues are in constant use by a host of congregations. They include a congregation from eastern Europe known as Minhag Ashkenaz and another consisting of Jews from Oriental countries. A third congregation represents the historic Spanish and Portuguese community of Jerusalem, thus providing a sense of continuity and a valued link with the past.

Digging your way through ancient Israel

Adventurous visitors to Israel could be going underground this year. Israel's Antiquities Authority has just released the latest list of archeological sites requiring volunteers.

You could be digging through the ancient remains of a palace in Caesaria, complete with Byzantine baths; sifting through the Bronze and Iron Age ruins of Megiddo, where according to Christian tradition, the world's last battle will take place; or exploring the spot at the foot of Mt. Hermon where Greek mythology tells us Pan's sanctuary was situated.

Out-of-shape volunteers beware! This is a job for the physically fit who prefer hard work to beach bumming. Daily activities often begin before dawn and end after noon, with late afternoon and early evening sometimes devoted to lectures or a little more excavation.

Volunteers are responsible for travel arrangements to and from Israel and are required, in some cases, to pay a small fee. Accommodations range from sleeping bags in the field to excellent kibbutz guest houses. Room and board rates vary as well, depending on the accommodation. However, swimming pools and beaches are often close by, with more than enough time for recreational diversions. Some of the expeditions even offer academic credits from sponsoring institutions.

Applications for participation in any of the 25 digs seeking volunteers should be sent to the organizations sponsoring them under the jurisdiction of Israel's Antiquities Authority. For more information, write to the Israel's Antiquities Authority POB 586, Jerusalem, 91004 Israel; or phone 011-972-2-292607; fax 011-972-2-292628; e-mail: harriet@israntique.org.il.

Israel's Arab citizens called a 'bridge of peace'

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

Within Israel's Green Line borders of 1967, some 800,000 Arabs live as Israeli citizens. They hold Israeli passports and were represented by three elected MKs in the last Knesset.

About 85 percent are Muslim and 15 percent – roughly 120,000 – are Christian. One of the most eloquent spokespersons of the Christian-Arab community is Antoine Shaheen, a former city councillor of Nazareth and director of the northern region for Israel's Tourism Ministry.

Israel's Christian-Arab citizens can be subdivided into Roman Catholic, Greek Orthodox, Coptic, Maronite and other denominations, but according to Shaheen, they are completely united in their support of and loyalty towards the Jewish state.

"Belonging to the State of Israel is very important to us and we believe that it has been the secret of our success," said Shaheen in a recent interview in Jerusalem.

"Since 1948, we have been loyal citizens of Israel and we link our future with the future of Israel."

Arab attitudes have changed enormously since the days when no Arab nation recognized Israel and those Arabs who chose to live peacefully within Israel were condemned as "collaborators," said Shaheen.

"The first positive step of the Arab world was when Egypt made peace, and a few years later it was Jordan. After the murder of the late prime minister [Yitzhak Rabin], we saw many Arab representatives attending the funeral and having many bad feelings about this murder. This shows that the camp of peace is growing."

Numbering 300,000 in 1948, the Arab community in Israel has served as "a sort of bridge of peace" between Israel and the rest of the Arab world, said Shaheen.

As a Roman Catholic active in church affairs in Israel, he has long attempted to persuade the Pope to establish diplomatic relations with Israel, a step that the Vatican took in 1994. Now Shaheen says he would like to see the Pope fulfil his promise to visit the Holy Land.

"In the year 2000, the Christian millenium, we are expecting as many as five million tourists. But if the Pope comes, the expectation in Christian circles is that we'll have many, many more. Imagine the Pope coming here and making an appeal to all Christians to visit the Holy Land. We would have to put everybody in tents!"

Many of Israel's Christian Arabs are of Palestinian origin and have a "sympathetic feeling" toward the Palestinians, Shaheen said.

"About the Palestinians, I will tell you that the general feeling is that we want this question to be solved," he said. "The minute these negotiations began, everyone was happy. We want peace to be concluded between Israel and the Palestinians. But this does not mean that we identify with violent acts or even with the intifada."

Israel's Christian Arabs have been strong opponents of terrorism, said Shaheen, who declares that most Arabs today are for peace. "I think that those groups that plant bombs are against Islam, against Christianity, against Judaism, against all religions. This is not a way to solve a problem. The world Islam means 'submission to the will of God,' and there are frank verses in the Koran that speak against committing suicide and against killing innocent people. This should be clear."

A member of the board of governors of Haifa University, Shaheen says he prefers to see a glass of water as half-full. Instead of emphasizing differences, he prefers to focus on the many points in common between Catholicism and Judaism.

"Our religion is more than half Jewish," he said. "We believe in the Old Testament and we believe in the New Testament. So I see it from a positive point of view because we have so much in common with the Jews. I sometimes call myself a Judeo-Christian, as they were in the second century."

As for the future, Shaheen characterized Israel's Christian Arabs as being overridingly optimistic. "We think that peace will overcome terrorism and violent acts," he said. "I don't think the terrorists have the least degree of hope of achieving their objective.

"Then we shall have a new Middle East, with cooperation and peaceful coexistence."

TWO SUPERB GUIDEBOOKS TO ISRAEL PRODUCED BY LONELY PLANET, KNOPF

It was about five years ago that fellow travel writers began telling me about the Lonely Planet series of travel guidebooks.

Although the Australia-based company had been started in 1973, its publications had just begun to penetrate the North American marketplace about that time. Yet Lonely Planet was already well along in establishing a reputation as a source of reliable, non-commercialized information about a growing list of places.

Now Lonely Planet guidebooks for such popular destinations as Israel, Canada, Great Britain and Mediterranean Europe are found in every major bookstore.

The books focus on key cultural and historic aspects, providing background that is always practical and thorough. Readers appreciate the easy readability, the personal voice that occasionally emerges to offer insider's advice and the novelistic sketches of local color and traditions that are presented intermittently in small print.

The books are written with the underlying assumption that travelling does broaden the mind and that travellers want to soak in local customs without getting soaked themselves. The books list hotels and restaurants, but are always considerate of travellers' pocketbooks.

Lonely Planet's "travel survival kit" for Israel ($21.95) is pretty much encyclopedic in scope and crams some 60 maps and floor plans into 470 pages. It treats the country in seven regions, including the "Occupied Territories," and presents additional sections on Geography, Flora and Fauna, Government and other topics. Its 19-page thumbnail essay on History tiptoes so delicately and successfully through this subjective minefield that it deserves praise as a journalistic masterpiece.

The book's coverage of a few emerging sites, such as the Beit Guvrin caves and the tunnels beneath the Western Wall, could be improved, however. The volume was first published in 1989 and updated in 1992, so a third printing is overdue.

Printed in a jewel-toned, full-color format, Knopf's recently-released guide to the Holy Land ($35) makes a selfish travelling companion, in that the tall-and-narrow volume may occupy all your time. Its 480 pages are an encyclopedia bursting with riches that are reminiscent of Life magazine at its best. Luscious paintings, photographs, maps and fold-outs jump out at you: Nomad's Tents, Crusader Architecture, Chagall's Windows, Masada, Costumes of the Chassidim.

Translated from a French original compiled by a large team of researchers and editors, this first American edition is lively, extraordinarily detailed, original and fascinating. Put simply, the book is a Rolls-Royce.

Some Solomonaic wisdom: Travel Talk recommends Lonely Planet for first-time visitors to Israel. For repeat visitors, Knopf makes a wonderful complement.

An Ancient Boat: Ten years ago, during a period of low water levels, an ancient boat was found buried in the muck along the shore of the Sea of Galilee in Israel. Archeologists were quick to recognize the antiquity of the vessel, since its planks were held in place by a mortise-and-tenon method of joints common about 2,000 years ago.

Measuring about seven feet long and seven-and-a-half feet wide, the well-carpentered vessel had sailed these waters in roughly the 1st century of the Common Era. Clay pots and oil lamps found in the mud around the vessel served to confirm its age.

Although much of its planking seemed intact, the boat was waterlogged and as fragile as wet cardboard. To preserve its delicate structure, the vessel was encased in a fibreglass shell, raised by crane, then submerged in a holding tank. To keep the wood from disintegrating, the water in the wood cells was replaced with wax.

On display at Kibbutz Ginnosar along the shore, the boat has excited intense interest. Nautical historians say it is a unique relic that has revealed much about ancient sailing conditions on the Sea of Galilee. The kibbutz regularly screens a short documentary film that outlines the boat's history and significance.

All That Jazz: In Eilat, the Red Sea Jazz Festival marks its 10th anniversary Aug. 26 to 29 with about 40 concerts, including performances by Spyro Gyra, George Coleman, Courtney Pine and the Phil Woods Quintet. After the official performances end, jazz fans are lured to unscheduled jam sessions that usually last until the early morning hours.

Israel Day program a hit

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

Young students at Pleasant Avenue Public School and Cedarvale Public School had a taste of the Middle East at a recent Israel Day program.

Orit Praag, departing schlichah for Habonim Dror, brought a team of volunteers to each school to supervise challah-making and Israel-related games and art projects. Volunteer Na'ama Mader collected a boxload of students' "secret wishes" to be inserted in the cracks of the Kotel.

Nava Gibson, who has a master's degree in cross-cultural communications and material culture, explained how indigenous plants and flowers are used in Israel for holidays.

The program, in which approximately 250 children took part (150 at Cedarvale, 100 at Pleasant), was a joint venture of Habonim Dror and the Canada-Israel Forum, sponsored by the Israel Experience Committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

This year's event was considered a pilot project, although Praag had brought a similar, smaller-scale program to Pleasant Avenue P.S. two years ago. Organizers hope to bring Israel Day to more schools next year.

Students learned about Israel's larger cities, its three main religions, and how to say hello and peace in Hebrew and Arabic.

"It was a very rewarding experience," said York University student Justine Apple, who ran a bingo-game based on knowledge of Israel.

Not just falafel

Praag had set out to create a meaningful study experience, she said. "Israel is not just falafel."

The day concluded with Israeli song and dance. Mickey Lewin, musical director of Camp Shalom, sang and played his guitar. "This is the dessert," said Praag, smiling.

"I think it's a valuable experience to learn about other cultures," said Patti Durkee, a Grade 5 teacher at Pleasant. "We're always trying to promote multiculturalism. Anything that enhances that is valuable, and a number of students are from Israel. An appreciation for others is something we're always trying to promote."

"It was fun," said Grade 6 student Jill Edelstein.

Sakhne's dreamy landscape makes it a treasure

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

One of the most beautiful spots in Israel, Gan Hashlosha National Park, better known to locals as Sakhne, offers tranquil pools of crystal turquoise water from a natural spring, gently flowing across a dreamy landscape of outstretched palm trees beneath a perenially blue heavenly dome.

Situated in the Lower Galilee near Mount Gilboa and Beit She'an, about 40 kilometres south of Tiberius, Sakhne attracts about half a million visitors per year, or about 2,000 people on an average day. But the spacious grounds rarely seem crowded for the many families that come to swim, picnic and frolic here.

With its many inviting pools and waterfalls, Sakhne is a favorite spot for Israelis and foreign visitors alike. Time magazine recently named the park one of the world's top 20 tourist sites.

Children enjoy using the water slide and participating in various staged activities. Ramps and other facilities for people with disabilities allow the wheelchair-bound to refresh themselves in these waters as well.

The water flows into the park at a rate of 2,400 cubic metres each hour at an even temperature of 28 C year-round. While its sulphur content of 930 milligrams per 1,000 litres makes it unsuitable for irrigation, the water is ideal for swimming.

Since it's conveniently situated on the road between Tiberius and Jerusalem or even Tel Aviv, many Israelis stop here for lunch or a refreshing dip enroute. The park's cafe and restaurant specializes in fish dishes direct from the productive fish-ponds of Ner David, an adjoining kibbutz.

There are two museums in the park. The first is the Wall and Tower Museum, which details conditions of early kibbutz life. The second is the Archeology Museum, which displays ancient objects found near Ner David as well as artifacts from the Mediterranean region.

Established in 1936, Ner David is known as the first kibbutz built by natives of Eretz Israel, as opposed to immigrants from Russia and other countries. Its founders were the pioneers of the region, and erected the wooden tower that is visible along the road.

Today the kibbutz grows vegetables such as tomatoes and cucumbers and operates a large fish farm. According to spokesperson Michael Yedid, Ner David is a leader in the fish-farming industry and operates a major research laboratory in association with the Ministry of Agriculture.

Since it is located on the road to a border crossing into Jordan, which is only about 10 km away, Sakhne has received some Jordanian visitors in recent years.

"Ever since we opened the border to Jordan, many Jordanians have come here to swim and have lunch," said Yedid.

Ten Canadian Jewish books honored for excellence

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO – Isaac Bashevis Singer once said, "One can have too much of anything – even kreplach," but the winner of the 1996 Louis Lockshin Memorial Award for Children's Literature disagrees.

"One cannot have too many books – or read too much," said Gary Clement in his acceptance speech at the eighth annual Jewish Book Awards evening, held recently at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

Ten Canadian Jewish books were honored with prizes totalling over $4,000. The awards were co-sponsored by the Koffler Centre of the Arts, the Holocaust Remembrance Committee of The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem.

"The purpose of these awards is to encourage publication of [Canadian, Jewish] books," said Bernard Katz, host and co-chair with Adam Fuerstenberg of the Jewish Book Awards Committee.

The awards honor books of many genres, including children's literature, fiction, history, biography and Yiddish translations. The 10 awards handed out this year were the most yet given.

"I understand this is a heimishe crowd this evening, so I'm going to put on my glasses," Lightstone told the audience before she began.

Known for her roles in the CBC production of Anne of Green Gables and Road to Avonlea, Lightstone has also received awards for her roles in the plays Lies My Father Told Me and The Tin Flute.

The themes of the award winning books ranged from the Holocaust to Jewish identity to Jewish equality. Several awards recipients referred to the importance of the books, not only for their literary enjoyment, but also for their role in maintaining cultural identity.

Freida Forman, one of four editors of Found Treasures, an anthology of stories translated from Yiddish, said, "The root of translation means to bring over or to carry over. Which is what we are doing with these stories. We are bringing over a culture."

The following awards were given out:

The Joseph and Faye Tannenbaum Award for Canadian Jewish History: Sheldon J. and Judith C. Godfrey, Search Out the Land: The Jews and the Growth of Equality in British Colonial America 1740-1867.

The Louis Lockshin Memorial Award for Children's Literature: Gary Clement, Just Stay Put.

Koffler Centre of the Arts President's Award for Jewish History: Erna Paris, The End Days. A Story of Tolerance, Tyranny and the Expulsion of the Jews from Spain.

> 'Bringing over a culture'

The Penina Rubinoff Memorial Award for Biblical Scholarship: Shoshana P. Zolty, And All Your Children Shall be Learned.

The Henry Fuerstenberg Memorial Award for Creative Writing in Poetry: Shel Krakofsky, Blind Messiah.

Artist revels in bold color

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Tova Raz's first love is art; her second is theatre. She was able to combine both when she created not only the backdrops, but all of the artifacts for the Jewish National Fund/Canadian Zionist Federation musical co-production, Our Jerusalem — Gan Yaldei Yisrael, celebrating Jerusalem 3000.

"I'm thrilled when I see my work brought to life onstage," she says.

Raz, who came here from Israel in 1986, spent the first five years accepting orders for a range of Judaica including beaded and appliqued Aron Kodesh curtains, chupahs, tallesim, matzoh covers.

"I had to earn a living," she says, "but I always dreamed of being a full-time artist."

Now she can indulge that dream.

Her training in Israel — she studied drawing at the Avni Institute and graphic design at ORT, where she later taught — prepared her for a decidedly individual approach.

She revels in color and prefers large scale projects, often working outside on her spacious apartment balcony in good weather, surrounded by masses of potted flowers in yellow, reds, pinks, purples, banked against greenery.

For the United Jewish Appeal Walkathon culminating in North York's Centennial Arena, she constructed and painted two walls with a pathway between, symbolizing entry to Jerusalem. Successful participants completed their walk when they passed through to the Holy City.

Enhancing organizational events is a welcome challenge. "I like to make them cheerful, attractive," she says.

When she isn't fashioning theatrical sets or special event concepts, Raz explores mixed media, focusing on the unusual. A portrait of a woman's face features haunting blue-green eyes which are actually peacock feathers, offset by hair and necklace of gold painted beads.

Hebrew lettering, which she considers the most beautiful of any, fascinates her. At a group show, Let it Be Light, presented at Holy Blossom Temple by Toronto Israeli artists, her contribution is a burst of color, yellows on dark canvas, with Hebrew words in gold, radiating from the fiery core.

Enigmatic Wiesenthal profiled

By JOSEPH SERGE
TAB News editor

TORONTO — Simon Wiesenthal is an enigma. Ever since Adolf Eichmann's capture in 1960, Wiesenthal's name has become synonymous with the term "Nazi-hunter."

Why is he idolized by many and yet discredited by others, including members of the Mossad and the World Jewish Congress (WJC) And how much, in fact, did Wiesenthal have to do with the capture of Eichmann?

In the biography Simon Wiesenthal, A Life In Search of Justice, (published by Weidenfeld & Nicolson, distributed by Douglas & McIntyre Ltd.) Hella Pick skillfully attempts to answer these and other questions. It is a thoughtful and objective book on Wiesenthal's controversial life.

Wiesenthal's professional life as a "Nazi-hunter" – a term the author is not entirely comfortable with – began with his liberation from the Mauthausen concentration camp – one of 13 camps Wiesenthal was imprisoned in. Right after the war, Wiesenthal submitted to the American War Crimes Unit a list of 91 names of Nazis he had come across. From then on , Wiesenthal has spent his whole life trying to bring Nazis to justice.

From the beginning Wiesenthal hasn't been interested in vengeance. "Right at this juncture Wiesenthal was already anxious to put on record the names of Nazis who behaved well. The 1945 document lists two men at the [camp] who had shown Wiesenthal such decency during his time spent under their regime.

Wiesenthal's aim has alway been justice. He refuses to let anyone involved – no matter how remotely – with the Holocaust live the rest of their lives as ordinary people.

"Justice has always been Wiesenthal's leitmotiv: justice that goes beyond acknowledgment of guilt and beyond apology... [Wiesenthal] has been consistent in arguing that punishment has to be individual, never collective, but that those suspected of war crimes must be exposed to the rigors of the law."

Wiesenthal, as Pick soon found out, is an amazing storyteller – a stickler for details – but she was soon to find out his stories were sometimes contradictory. However, she dismissses this for two reasons: The recollections of a man who'd been through his Holocaust experience can sometimes be tainted and also, no one denies Wiesenthal can be egotistical.

It may be his ego that forced him to work as an individual, starting his own documentation centre and refusing to work with other groups. This egotism has been criticized by others – perhaps out of jealousy – and has been partly responsible for the rift between him, the WJC, Mossad agent Isser Harel and Nazi hunter Beate Klarsfeld.

The amount of work Wiesenthal has been involved in is too immense for Pick to write about completely and instead, like any good biographer, she focuses on the most important and controversial events

These include his work in hunting down Franz Stangl and the notorious Odessa File, Josef Mengele (who was never caught), the sadistic female camp guard Hermine Braunsteiner (who was caught in New York), Karl Silberbauer (the SS man who ordered Anne Frank's arrest – he was arrested but never convicted) and Adolf Eichmann.

"Without doubt, the origins of Wiesenthal's fame and of his legend as an intrepid hunter of Nazi criminals stem from the Eichmann case. But so also do the attempts to discredit him with question marks over the extent of his contribution to Eichmann's eventual capture by the Mossad in 1960.

Perhaps the most bitter person is Harel, former head of the Mossad and leader of the team that spirited Eichmann away from Argentina. Harel's biggest regret is that because it was a covert operation, the Israeli government prohibited him from writing about his own role in the Eichmann capture for 15 years.

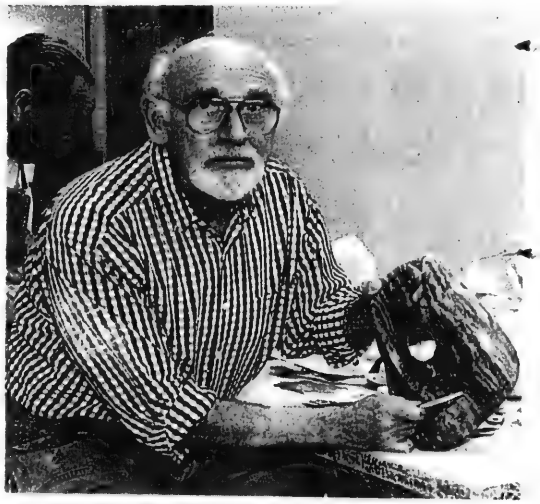
By that time, Wiesenthal's I hunted Eichmann had turned him into a celebrity. By 1975 when Harel published his account of the capture in The House on Garibaldi Street (where no mention is made of Wiesenthal), Wiesenthal's name was inextricably linked to Eichmann and Harel, no longer a Mossad chief, was living in obscurity near Tel Aviv.

Pick's biography also touches on Wiesenthal's other big controversy – Kurt Waldheim. "Wiesenthal has been demonised by fellow Jews for persisting with the contention that there was insufficient evidence to charge Waldheim with war crimes. Contentiousness and jealousies that regularly plague Jewish life have been put on display for all the world to see."

Pick claims that his refusal to accuse Waldheim of war crimes blemished his reputation in the United States and prevented him from securing a Nobel Peace Prize. But as stated earlier, Wiesenthal was never after vengence and he never believed in witch hunts. Although he believes Waldheim was a liar, "calling him a liar was still a far cry from branding him a war criminal and that is an allegation Wiesenthal has steadfastly refused to make."

Pick never denies that Wiesenthal's life story is full of miracles on a mythological scale and definitely full of controversy.

And throughout the book, she picks out Wiesenthal's faults and exaggerations. Written in straightforward prose, unblemished by the archaic prose of some biographers, it is a fair evaluation of Wiesenthal: "Wiesenthal has been an exemplar, and yes, it has been a hero's life: not just a Jewish hero's life, but a hero of our epoch."



CENTRE SCULPTURE GROUP

Herb Liebman is one of many who've found stone sculpture classes an enjoyable and challenging experience. Every Monday and Thursday, in the old Forest Hill municipal building on Eglinton and Chaplin in Toronto, around 15 people get together to wield stone hammers and chisels as they work to create sculpture in stone. Guiding their efforts is sculptor Irene Blogg, who has been with the Centre Sculpture Group since it began over 20 years ago. While the main focus of the group is stone carving, students are encouraged to explore other media including wood carving and preparing wax for bronze. The group welcomes new members, including those with no previous sculpting experience. For more information call 416-781-2771.

Whatever Happened to Susi?

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
CJN Staff Reporter

Can a single event, however seemingly minor, change one's life? In Grace Stocken's case, the answer is a resounding yes.

Thanks to a radio program about European Jewish refugees she heard by chance one day, Stocken — a typically middle-class British housewife — discovered her true origins.

Grace's poignant journey of discovery is related in Whatever Happened to Susi? The documentary is to be broadcast on Vision TV on June 28 at 7:30 p.m.

The story really begins in Munich, Germany, in May 1939, when Grace and her 3-year-old twin sister were sent out of harm's way to Britain by their Jewish mother.

Originally named Susi and Lotte Bechhofer, the girls were adopted by a Baptist minister and his wife from Wales. Renamed Grace and Eunice, Susi and Lotte were given a strict evangelical Christian upbringing.

Although the sisters were aware they had come from an orphanage, they knew nothing else about their background. As a result, Grace and Eunice (who died at the age of 35) grew up with a sense of loss and rootlessness.

But after listening to the abovementioned radio program, Grace — a married woman by now — decided to establish her real identity.

The quest led Grace to the United States and Germany, where clues turned up about her ancestry.

In a suburb of New York City, she was united with Orthodox Jewish relatives who taught her the rudiments of Judaism and gave her information about her late mother, Rosa.

In Munich, she learned more about Rosa and also about Rosa's common-law relationship with a German man — Otto Hald — who deserted her before the birth of the twins.

This, of course, is the stuff of great emotion and sentiment, and to the credit of the film, it all comes off without a trace of mawkishness.

Wex Waxes Poetic: A German-language production of Michael Wex's play God In Paris, which premiered at the much-celebrated Ashkenaz festival at Harbourfront last summer, has been doing well on a tour in Germany, and Wex is flying there this week for a brief stint in the four-person cast.

The full title of the play is God In Paris: The Life Of A Yiddish Poet, and it tells the story of a fictitious Yiddish literateur. Wex calls it a "semi-musical" and credits Heiko Lehmann of Germany, with whom he collaborated by e-mail, for writing the songs.

"It's been playing to non-Jewish audiences on and off since October," he said. "We've gotten good reviews. People are generally getting it over there, which was not the case when we did it in Canada."

According to the playwright, whose wry comic monologues have made him a legend in international Jewish storytelling circles, God In Paris focuses on a character "who is not exactly sympathetic and whose expressed attitudes are not be to identified with the author. The main character is a provocateur in many ways: very much against the gentiles, and very obnoxious."

In addition to his writing, Wex works as a translator of Yiddish novels, rendering them into suitable English prose. His current project is a translation of Dos Vintshfingerl (The Magic Ring), a major novel of Mendele Mokher Seforim, who is generally recognized as the earliest of the three established patriarchs of Yiddish letters.

"It's one of those classics that even in Yiddish circles is discussed more than it's read, because it's long and difficult," Wex said.

"A critic named Fishman, who was also a Yiddish writer, said sometime around 1910 that if all of East European Jewry were to be wiped out, you could reconstruct the entire society on the basis of this book."

Wex himself is writing a novel that he described as a full-length prose treatment of God In Paris. And when that isn't occupying him? "I'm working on another stage show for Germany, which we're hoping to have up and running by October."

In Brief: Beginning this week and continuing to Oct. 20, the Art Gallery of Ontario (AGO) is running J.J. Tissot: Prints from the Gotlieb Collection, an exhibition of prints and paintings by French artist J.J. Tissot (1836-1902). The collection was donated to the AGO by former U.S. ambassador Allan Gotlieb and his wife Sondra.

Jewish Contemporary Singles continues to thrive

Jewish Contemporary Singles, an introduction agency serving the Jewish community since 1985, is thrilled to announce its 1 year anniversary under the new management of Jennifer Sharpe.

In this first year, Jennifer has expanded the client base tremendously and has enjoyed much success in matching couples. Jennifer takes pride in her uncanny ability to match people who really belong together and people become "paired" often on their first or second date. Our first couple became engaged in April and we have had several others since then!

Jennifer has a degree from U of T in Sociology with special emphasis on interpersonal relations. She has been a well-known and popular Wedding Consultant in the Toronto area for the past 7 years which has allowed her to meet many men and women in the Jewish community. These contacts continue to enhance J.C.S.'s client base.

Jewish Contemporary Singles is run based on a personal approach. Jennifer consults with each new member personally for about 45 minutes as well as having them fill out a questionnaire. This allows her to listen while the member "tells her their story" and information about who they are and what they are hoping for in a mate. Jennifer's approach to matchmaking is "warm and thoughtful". Although using a dating service is becoming a growing trend in how singles are meeting these days, Jennifer is aware and sensitive to the stigmas people may have, so she tries to keep the process as "friendly" and "uninstitutional" as possible.

This system is unlike any others. The superficial process of looking at pictures and reading biographies (which may or may not be accurate) is not how Jewish Contemporary Singles works. What you can expect from Jennifer is a phone call (as often as an appropriate date is found) giving you details about someone Jennifer feels is suitable for you. No telephone numbers are exchanged until both parties have okay'd the date. Jennifer is "a bit old-fashioned" so she usually gives the man the woman's phone number and asks him to make the first move. After the date, Jennifer likes feedback from the individuals so she knows how to guide her selections for the next time.

As always, fees continue to be reasonable and payment plans are available. Interviews are by appointment - days, evenings and weekends. You can be on your way to meeting that someone special, handpicked just for you. This service remains strictly confidential. Call today! (416) 484-9733.

"With all the singles in Toronto, why haven't I met the right one?"

- ☑ "I hate the bar scene."
- ☑ "I'm new in Toronto."
- ☑ "My friends are all married and don't know any eligible singles."

Another record-breaking month for the Jewish Singles Registry

May was a record-breaking month for new memberships at the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto, and the rest of the summer looks great, so says director Rob Singer. In a little over three and a half years the J.S.R. concept of letting members choose for themselves who they would like to meet by viewing biography/profiles and photographs has swept Toronto singles with a passion. New members are joining on a daily basis, a good portion of which are referrals from friends who are already part of the J.S.R. Most new members are dating within a week or so of joining the service. IT IS THAT EASY! Membership is now well over 1,000 members.

ANOTHER ENGAGEMENT

Mazel Tov is in the air as yet another J.S.R. couple will be walking down the aisle in just a few months. It has also been reported that two other couples will be announcing their engagements by summer's end. No doubt about it ... if you are looking to meet other Jewish singles, be it for friendship, dating, or even marriage, the time is now to register with the Jewish Singles Registry.

J.S.R. "GUARANTEE" ELIMINATES THE RISK FACTOR

The majority of J.S.R. members never joined a dating service before and the J.S.R. guarantee makes signing up virtually risk free. In the event that a member has not received a minimum of six potential dates within the first year of membership, the Registry agrees to waive a member's second year renewal fee for a period of up to 12 months from the expiry of his/her first year's registration, or until the member has received six potential dates. There is virtually no risk in joining the Jewish Singles Registry of Toronto. You can contact the Registry office for more details.

WHAT'S NEW

There is a lot of exciting things happening at the J.S.R. but just exactly what they are, Singer is keeping quiet about. "We are working on many new projects, both external and internal designed to put the J.S.R. in the forefront for the 21st century." he says. "A lot of time and effort has already been put into these projects and as soon as we are ready to announce them The Canadian Jewish News readers will be the first to know."

OPEN SIX DAYS A WEEK

Contacting the J.S.R. has never been easier. It is as simple as picking up your phone and calling Right Now. The Registry is open six days a week for your convenience including evening hours. If you don't reach them in person the first try, don't worry ... as their 24 hour a day answering system will accept messages on your behalf.

If you are Jewish, single, and looking for the "right" one, The Jewish Singles Registry is it! Just call 416-398-7068.

Tired of Blind Dates
The Jewish Singles Registry offers an unlimited number of introductions that you select from an extensive Bio/Photo library. It's a great way for you to connect with people you might normally never get a chance to meet.

Your contact for frames and lenses

"Would you like your friends to admire your glasses, and ask: 'Where did you get those gorgeous frames?' Would you like your glasses to look good, and feel light and comfortable? Or have you decided to try contact lenses that change the color of your eyes, and make you unique and mysterious?"

These are questions which Focus Optical's Assistant Manager Julia Biberberg wants to ask every prospective customer. If you answered Yes to any of them — or if you just want first-rate service — visit Focus Optical Labs, where the most demanding clients are satisfied.

Opened in 1985 by Tibor Klein, Focus has many long-term customers who buy glasses and lenses here year after year, and bring their families and friends. "Come to us once," says Julia, "and chances are you'll become a regular customer. Our second generation is now coming along.

"Have you given up on getting 20/20 vision from your glasses?" she asks. "If so, give it another chance — and let Focus fit you with the frame and lenses that correct your visual problem. As our lab is on the premises, most prescriptions are ready the same day."

There are many designer frames here to suit your tastes; or if you want to throw away your glasses, Focus Optical's experienced contact lens fitter will help you get the best corrective contacts. Whatever your preferences, you will find quality eyewear here. The 4256 Bathurst St. store also specializes in hearing aids.

Focus' owners Tibor Klein and Ethan Ticktin are opticians; Julia Biberberg and Marianna Saltsov are student opticians. They and all the dedicated staff at Focus enjoy talking with customers, to discover how to meet their needs and preferences. "We've expanded through the years," says Julia; "but our motto has not changed: 'Your vision is our concern'."

Focus Optical supports many community organizations' fundraising projects, as well as participating in community sports events. "We're friendly, too," says Julia; "customers drop in when they're in the neighbourhood, just to chat."

The staff at Focus Optical look forward to seeing you. Come to either of Focus' two locations: at 243 Wilmington Ave. in the Bathurst Manor Plaza 416-630-7911; and at 4256 Bathurst St., in the medical building across from Earl Bales Park 416-633-9698.

Boutique quality, warehouse prices

Deblins Linens is a family business whose dedicated staff maintains a level of service that keeps regular customers coming back. The Orfus Road Superstore is always busy with walk-in trade and referrals, including serious comparison shoppers who know the difference between a good deal and a great one.

The Chitiz family created the three-store chain with a view to offering their customers the four things that developed their business: quality of merchandise, selection, low prices, and service.

Deblins Linens offers you exactly what you want and need in a huge variety of bedding, table linens, bathware and accessories — and helpful, well-informed staff to answer every question, and advise you on matters like color coordination and product or fabric care. Deblins' quality linens will make your "home sweet home" brighter and better appointed.

Need sheets? Deblins has a full range of sizes, patterns and colors. Deblins' wide assortment of ready-made drapes, curtains and valances are chosen to match all sheet designs, making it easier for you to beautify your entire home. There is a huge stock of first-quality pillow coverings, duvets and duvet covers, with five different styles of duvets and nine different styles of pillows.

Towels? For solid colors, Deblins stocks Fieldcrest Royal Velvet in 24 colors. For designs, there are Jacquard towels and Spirella printed towels — all quality brand names, always at the lowest possible prices. There's also a wide assortment of bath accessories, shower curtains, towel racks and mats.

Tablecloths, napkins, napkin rings and table pads for your Sabbath table or everyday dining are here in abundance. The top brand names are always in stock, at the lowest prices anywhere.

Deblins' prices are so low they don't even offer designer discounts, yet they carry only the best quality — no irregulars or seconds. Deblins therefore doesn't match prices. "If you find it cheaper elsewhere," says President Ellis Chitiz, "buy it; but compare apples with apples." He is confident that when you compare price and quality, you will find that Deblins offers the better deal.

"When you walk out our door," says Ellis, "you will be carrying quality linen, at probably the best price in the city; and you will definitely have enjoyed the best service. If you have a problem with any of these three, let me know."

Deblins' largest store is the Superstore at 39 Orfus Road, with 10,000 square feet of merchandise, (416) 782-2910. Deblins also has stores in The Promenade Mall at Bathurst and Centre Street, (905) 709-0007, and the Mississauga Home and Design Centre at Winston Churchill and Dundas St., (905) 820-1509. All three stores are open seven days a week.

IF YOU FIND A BETTER PRICE ANYWHERE ELSE

A lot of stores today offer a price guarantee. That means if you find a lower price anywhere else, they'll match it. So after running around to find a better price, all you're left with is the option to pay the same price somewhere else.

BUY IT

But isn't the best price what you're really looking for? Then shop at Deblins Linens. We don't match prices. Our goal is to offer you the lowest price in the first place. Sure, you might find an odd item at a lower price in another store, but don't come rushing back to Deblins to pay the same price. Just buy it. We're confident that when you compare both quality and price, nine times out of ten you'll get the better deal at Deblins ... not just the same deal.

Blue Jays draft Toronto high school hurler

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Blue Jays could use some pitching, but they may have to wait a few years before Josh Glober is ready to fit into their lineup.

Glober, 18, was the Jays' 50th round selection in the recent amateur draft. A right-hander who throws for Leaside of the Metro Toronto League and for Upper Canada College (UCC) Blues in the Toronto District College Athletic Association (TDCAA), Glober was on cloud nine after being chosen by his favorite team.

"I was pretty excited. It didn't sink it. It still hasn't sunk in," he said.

A longtime Blue Jays fan, Glober isn't ready to commit to the team by signing a pro contract. Although being selected by the Jays was a heartening "pat on the back," he's not sure he's ready to give up his academic future for the tough grind of the minor leagues.

A week after being drafted, he gave every indication that focusing on his academic future took priority over his athletic one.

"I don't expect to sign. I probably won't," he said. "I have high school left and hopefully I'll go down to the United States and play college ball there."

Glober, who's completing Grade 12, expects to do some scouting of his own next year as he searches for a U.S. college to attend. Warm weather and the state of North Carolina are on his mind. He's hoping to earn a scholarship to either Duke or Wake Forest, but failing the scholarship route, he may enrol at one of the schools anyway.

He believes that he'll improve with time, get stronger and may be a higher pick when he re-enters the draft after his third year of college.

At six foot two, 162 pounds, it's clear he could put some meat on those bones. If he gets stronger, there's a good chance he'll be able to improve on his 82 mph fastball, his best pitch. Although he tosses more fastballs than any other pitch, his arsenal includes the curve and a changeup.

He got the chance to show his wares last May at an evaluation camp in Toronto that was attended by scouts from the Jays, the Twins, the Padres and the Mets.

"It felt good to be recognized as one of the better players in the area, but I didn't think too much of it," he said. He knew of other guys who'd participated in previous camps and hadn't been drafted.

After warming up, he was asked to throw about 35 pitches and that was it. It appears, however, that was enough. Next thing he knew, Bill Byckowski, Blue Jays' director of Canadian scouting, was calling, telling him he'd been drafted.

In his first game for Leaside after the draft, he admits he felt "sort of weird," but he played well at shortstop, his fielding position.

His UCC coach Bart Badali thinks Glober has what it takes to make it at any number of U.S. colleges, but the pros, well that's a much tougher proposition. Only one of 14 who sign with major league clubs ever get to play in the majors, he says.

Still, he likes what he sees in Glober. "He's got control. He has three good pitches he can throw for strikes, a fastball, a sidearm fastball and a curve," Badali said. The sidearm fastball comes into a right-handed hitter like a left-hander's curve, he explained.

"Josh is very dedicated, very athletic and he knows the game. He's very focused and goal-oriented," he said.

A baseball player since he was eight, Glober didn't start pitching until he turned 14. Badali believes that relatively late start gives him an edge over others of the same age. Many pitchers who've been throwing hard since they were 10 develop sore arms by Glober's age, he said.

Glober developed a strong arm playing shortstop and like other kids, he practised interminably, playing "wall ball" with friends by pitching a tennis ball past a batter who was standing in front of a wall that served as a backstop.

In Grade 10, he laced up his cleats for UCC and this season, the Blues, ranked fifth, lost in the TDCAA's quarter finals.

Earlier in the season, he led the Blues to a 10-2 win versus a team from Detroit.

Last year, he notched a 10-1 record with Leaside to go with a 2.69 ERA.

Glober comes by his athletic predisposition honestly. His father, Saul, was an Olympian on the Canadian basketball team in 1968 and he represented Canada four times (1965, '69, '73 and '77) at the Maccabiah Games in Israel, winning three bronze medals.

Saul also played in the Intercounty Baseball League, where he was known as a power hitter.

Correction

In our story last week about Jews in the NBA, we incorrectly reported that Dolph Schayes coached the Philadelphia 76ers to the league championship in the 1965-66 season. In fact, the 76ers won the Eastern Division regular season title that season but lost the Eastern Division final to Boston, which went on to win the championship.

Introducing Value Range Marketing

When it comes to getting your home sold fast, It runs circles around fixed-price listings.

You want your home sold fast. And at the right price. That's why you should talk to us about a revolutionary, yet proven listing program that's resulted in faster sales everywhere it's been introduced. And 65% of all Value Range Marketed homes have sold for more than the owner expected.

THE PRUDENTIAL VRM VALUE RANGE MARKETING

Instead of listing your home the old way at a fixed price, you and your real estate agent use the Value Wheel to select a "value range" in which you're "willing to entertain offers." This lets you attract qualified buyers at both ends of your price range.

About jobs

Dear Lisa,

This week I'm finishing school and I still don't have a summer job. I'm really in a panic. What should I do? Where should I go?

Dear Reader,

Canada Employment Centres for Students are made for people in your shoes. They open in May each year to offer job hunting assistance to students. Boards post advertisements for available jobs in the area. Each ad has a job description and contact information.

"The boards are being updated with new jobs almost every day," says Jill Childs, summer employment officer, Canada Employment Centre for Students. "Right now we have about 70 jobs on our boards."

The centres also offer weekly seminars on where to look for jobs and how to prepare strong resumes and cover letters. Some offices have computers that can be used by students visiting the centres. Application forms for government positions are also available.

To find the centre in your city or town, look in the blue pages of your phone directory under the listing Human Resource Development Canada, find the Employment & Insurance office in your area, and call the Employment Service number.

Many United Way-funded agencies also offer employment assistance. The YMCA has a Youth Employment Services office with job placement assistance and counselling available to those who qualify. Many neighborhood services also offer help.

Some camps are also still looking for staff. Provincial camping associations maintain lists of these places. Camp experience is an asset in getting one of these jobs and many positions require lifesaving qualifications that include the National Lifeguard Service certificate and Bronze Cross. Jobs are in a variety of areas including counselling, water sports, maintenance, kitchen work, professional staff.

You can check with the career centre at your school. The staff are often aware of summer and part-time jobs in the area and can recommend you to an employer who has advertised with them.

Other places to check include the local shopping mall, the library, wherever you exercise and your teachers. If you don't see any advertisements, you can approach these people directly and let them know you are looking for a summer job.

Another source of work is your parents, friends and neighbors. Mowing lawns, baby-sitting, painting, walking the dog and running errands can all earn you money. You can make up a flyer and post it in local stores or deliver it to a select group of homes where you would be willing to work.

Being a student means you are taking courses. It does not mean you don't have skills. Sell others on your organizational skills, your ability to learn new things and your eagerness to please.

Job Search is a monthly column by job search consultant Lisa Galet. Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Lisa to The CJN.

Musical looks back nostalgically at Casino Theatre's 'den of iniquity'

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — In some places it was called a "den of iniquity," but many Torontonians have a warm spot in their memories for the old Casino Theatre, where the Sheraton Hotel now stands.

"What we put on was kindergarten stuff compared to what's available in popular entertainment today," said Murray Little who ran the Casino for 25 years.

And yet the popular burlesque house manager was summoned before the Toronto Police Commission in 1944 to answer complaints from church people about language and actions on stage. The commission took no action.

But the police did stop the Casino from running Sunday midnight shows. And the Casino shows were always under surveillance.

"We had well-behaved audiences and in all those years we only had to call the police in once to break up a fight not related to anything on stage," the former manager said.

The reason may be that the Casino, unlike burlesque houses in some U.S. cities, had no runway to bring the strippers close to the paying customers, said Dr. Barry Little, 63, one of three sons of the manager, who worked in the theatre. Barry and his brothers, Gerald, 65, and Alan, 60, were "candy butchers," ushers who sold confectionery during intermissions.

The theatre's history was the subject of Four a Day, a musical presented last October to an audience of 500 in the Celebrity Concert Series produced by Ruth Morawetz and written by Patrick Rose and Barry Little.

With only three performers, it still managed to evoke the flavor of the Queen Street theatre, including the drum roll that punctuated every ribald joke and Gypsy Rose Lee's advice to put on a show "that keeps the customers in and the cops out."

In its first year, 1936, it cost 10 cents to attend the Casino in the morning, 27 cents in the afternoon and 35 cents at night, said Barry Little who emceed Four a Day, which attracted hundreds of the Casino's former patrons.

Later the Casino changed its format to include headliners along with its chorus line, strippers, comedians and movies. Among the stars who appeared there were Louis Armstrong, Phil Silvers, Vic Damone, Eartha Kitt, Henny Youngman, Mel Torme, Ella Fitzgerald, Victor Borge, Ethyl Watters, Duke Ellington, Count Basie, Sammy Davis, Frankie Laine and the Three Stooges.

"Burlesque was an art form of its own, separate from vaudeville, but the performers used to steal material from vaudeville skits and change it," said Little.

At the age of 86, Murray Little, and his wife the former Lillian Applebaum, can look back on an eventful life in show business. "When the Casino closed down, live theatre in Toronto was dead. Now it's bigger than it ever was. I enjoy musicals like Showboat and Crazy for You but I don't like rock and roll music and I don't like the violence, corruption and sex so prevalent in the movies," he said.

In 1935, Murray Little was horrified to find the body of Abraham Applebaum, his father-in-law, at the Roxy Theatre, the Casino's predecessor, murdered in an apparent robbery attempt. The crime remains unsolved.

When the Casino closed, Murray Little changed his high-pressure job to become a movie projectionist at the Don Mills Theatre, no longer in existence, and the Varsity Theatre in the ManuLife building.

"I'd never fit in now," he said, when asked if he missed show business.

Peace process uncertain

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Revival of the peace process appears uncertain, as Israeli and Arab leaders have accused each other of placing obstacles in the way of continuing negotiations.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last Sunday charged Arab leaders with trying to set preconditions for peace negotiations and thus interfering with chances of moving the process forward.

He was reacting to the closing statement of the Arab summit in Cairo last weekend warning Israel that further peace efforts would be jeopardized if the Netanyahu government deviates from the land-for-peace principle which has been the basis of Arab-Israeli peace negotiations since 1991.

The threats emanating from Cairo and Israel's terse response came as U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher was scheduled to visit the region to assess the latest developments in the peace process. He was expected to visit Israel on Tuesday and Egypt on Wednesday.

"To achieve peace, there must be no preconditions," Netanyahu told reporters Sunday night. "We won't dictate to them and they should not dictate to us.

"Any attempts to set preconditions in negotiations would endanger Israel's security. We must get rid of preconditions, so that Israel and the Arab states can move forward with the peace that is the hope of all of us."

Earlier in the day, speaking in Kiryat Gat at the opening of the annual assembly of the Jewish Agency for Israel, Netanyahu said the most fundamental requirement of the peace process is that "it cannot be made hostage to any preconditions."

Southern Baptists' call poses 'threat'

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Another chapter in the long and often acrimonious story of Christians bent on converting Jews is being written, with the passage this month of a proclamation bluntly encouraging members of the huge U.S. Southern Baptist Convention (SBC) to evangelize Jews.

The development poses a direct threat to Canada, warns Jews for Judaism, the counter-missionary group.

At its recent annual meeting in New Orleans, the SBC overwhelmingly passed a resolution calling on its 15.6 million members to evangelize Jews. The convention – the largest Protestant denomination in the United States – also appointed a full-time minister to reach out to the Jewish community.

The controversial move – seen by some as dealing another blow to Christian-Jewish relations – signals a new and "dangerous" trend because it puts in writing what many evangelical Baptists on both sides of the border may have already been doing or felt the urge to do for years, said Jews for Judaism's Canadian director, Julius Ciss.

"It's a threat in that it will rekindle the embers of certain Baptists who have been sitting on the fence," Ciss told The CJN. "This is now official policy and it will get them off the fence. They'll think now it's OK to go after Jews."

Ciss said the policy could also have a "dangerous spillover effect" on other Protestants, who may now feel emboldened to missionize Jews.

If the call is taken seriously, Ciss said, it could unleash potentially hundreds of people with a new purpose: convert the Jews in order to "save" them.

According to one report, the SBC has nearly 5,000 missionaries across North America.

Ciss also warns that members of other Christian groups which, unofficially at least, single out Jews for conversion, will "beat a path" to the well-funded Southern Baptists for money to subsidize their efforts.

The SBC resolution, which passed without debate, states that adherents are "indebted" to Jews, and claims there has been "an organized effort on the part of some either to deny that Jewish people need to come to their Messiah, Jesus, to be saved; or to claim that Christians have neither right nor obligation to proclaim the gospel to the Jewish people."

It further quotes a passage from the book of Romans admonishing that the Gospels be spread "to the Jew first and also to the Greek [gentile]."

Finally, the nub: the resolution calls on members to "direct our energies and resources toward the proclamation of the Gospel to the Jewish people."

Jews involved in dialogue with Christians will wait and see how other Christian denominations will react, remarked Rabbi David Levy of Kitchener, Ont., who chairs Canadian Jewish Congress's interreligious affairs committee.

Families who have used Hebrew Basic Burial's services have all found that dignity and observance of Jewish law were exactly as they should be.

Low cost is just one of many factors which may be involved in arranging a burial that meets a family's emotional and spiritual needs. We welcome inquiries from people who would like to know more about the option of a basic Jewish graveside service and the savings that go with it.

Multiculturalism, diversity said key to unity

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO — "Multiculturalism and diversity should and must unite us as Canadians," said Max Bernard, chair of the National Unity Committee for Canadian Jewish Congress.

Bernard and pollster Donna Dasko were speakers at a symposium on Canada's future, held recently at the Park Plaza Hotel. Each spoke on a panel where they discussed the future of Canada and Quebec.

"We must focus on definition not recognition," said Bernard, as he urged Canadians to recognize and accept both their cultural differences and their common Canadian heritage.

"I am proud to be Jewish, Quebecois and Canadian," he said.

Dasko, vice-president of Environics is a self-proclaimed cynical baby-boomer. She was more cautious in her approach and spoke of the change in Canada's values over the past two decades. Canadians have lowered their expectations of their government, she said, blaming this on a deflating economy.

"We have to start reassessing our ability to do and tailoring our country to suit our needs," she said.

Max Bernard

Backed by a number of charts and statistics, Dasko showed a vicious cycle in the Canada/Quebec relationship.

"Canada wants Quebec," she said, "but doesn't want to give more."

She said 63 percent of Canadians polled were opposed to giving Quebec more power. As well, 53 percent were opposed to recognizing Quebec as a distinct society.

Bernard referred to Canada's frustration. "Canadians are tired of dealing with the constitutional debate," he said. "We want to deal with other issues."

But he refused to admit that Canadians are giving up on Quebec. "If we continue to believe that opinion, we're blowing it."

There is, however, a lack of communication between separatists and federalists, he said.

"What we need to do is ask the separatists what they want and then talk about it." He suggested drawing up a "wish list."

"If separatists could succeed in defining what they want for themselves, it would be much easier for the rest of Canada to define their needs," he said.

As well, he cited the importance of including youth in constitutional debates. "The solution may be to bring together 10 to 12 young people and let them define Canada."

His words came, appropriately, after Craig Kielburger, 13, had expressed a similar idea. Kielburger, the founder of the organization Free the Children, said he believes that 10 young people could solve the unity problem better than adult politicians, because they would come to the issue with a clean slate.

"I wasn't alive during the first referendum in Quebec [1980] and I had to learn about Rene Levesque and Pierre Trudeau through history books like I learned about Julius Caesar."

He spoke of youth's passion for a united Canada. "We the young people want to feel the vastness of the land in our bones and the greatness of the people who founded it."

He emphasized that Canada should focus on bringing people, not provinces, together.

Bernard echoed the same message by encouraging more communication between regions. "If we had consensus," he said, "we would not have to worry about separation."

The symposium was sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, the Council for Canadian Unity and York University.

Self-portrait of young soldier uplifting, melancholy

From the editor's desk

Every now and then, one comes across a book whose impact is like a hand reaching out from the sky, a sudden ethereal force touching your heart, stopping you where you stand.

Last week across my desk, I received such a book. It is called Alex - Building a Life: The Story of an American Who Fell Defending Israel, Told in His Letters, Journals and Drawings.

The Alex of the title is Alex Singer. He was killed on Sept. 15, 1987, the day he turned 25. He was deputy commander of a company of Givati soldiers. He had gone to rescue his commander who had been cut down in an ambush in southern Lebanon. He was killed attempting to save him. A third soldier was killed on the same spot trying to extricate both Alex and the commander.

The book is remarkable.

Like the sound of the wind blowing through trees on a high mountain it is melancholy and inspiring at the same time. The reader "meets" an extraordinary young man, whose death we come to mourn; and whose life we come to celebrate. The short biographical facts of Alex's life are written on the back flap of the book's jacket.

"Alex Singer was born in White Plains, N.Y., on Sept. 15, 1962, the second of four brothers. In 1973, Alex, then 11, went to Israel with his family. During their four years in Israel Alex attended Israeli schools, including one year at a kibbutz high school. Returning to the U.S. in 1977, Alex went to high school in the Washington, D.C., area and then to Cornell University where he concentrated on Russian and Jewish studies. Alex spent his junior year studying at the London School of Economics as well as travelling in Russia, Spain, Italy and England. His senior thesis, "Letters from the Diaspora," which grew from these experiences, won him Cornell's highest honors. Following graduation, Alex studied Arabic then put it to use during a trip alone to Jordan. At the end of 1984, Alex immigrated to Israel. He was drafted into the Israeli army in February 1985, volunteered for the paratroops, became an officer in October 1986 and a platoon commander in the Givati brigade in May 1987."

The book is a compilation of Alex's letters, notes and drawings from his years at Cornell until two days before his death, individual brush strokes of an uplifting, passionate self-portrait painted on a canvas at times intense and raging as the open seas, at times calm and serene as a slow stream in a country meadow. It is poetry and prose. It is trite and poignant. It is funny and it is sad. It evokes laughter; it evokes tears.

In an elegiac afterword, Alex's mother, Suzanne, describes how they made the decision to publish Alex's writings and drawings.

"On Mount Herzl we were surrounded by hundreds of people, some of whom had known Alex, and many others, unknown to us or to Alex, there to honor his commitment to Israel and the Jewish people...Then the casket was lowered into the soil of Jerusalem and, passing the shovel among us, we threw the stone-filled earth into the grave. We buried a son, a brother, a joyous and loving companion, an inspiration, a promise without bounds, We buried someone who had walked with God, whose choices had been measured by the commandment of tikun olam, the Hebrew commandment to repair the world under the rule of God, and whose life, while only 25 years, had been marvelously full and whole. We left him on an exquisite hilltop in the country and city he loved.

"In Jerusalem, during the shiva, we passed among us the three journals, Alex kept while he was in the army. We looked at the drawings...of places where he had stayed or guarded or rested on manoeuvres and of the people he had served with. We read the entries... laughed...felt his physical and emotional pain...and shared his elation with the challenge of platoon command....The decision to exhibit Alex's art and publish his writings was taken in Jerusalem as we mourned...

"In front of the window in my office hangs a reproduction of a medieval stained glass depicting Noah standing at the window of the ark, hand outstretched, releasing a dove. I think of Alex. Many years ago we released Alex to the world. He had been a gift in trust to us, whom we nurtured and loved and taught, but when the time came, we set him free. Now it is our task, empowered by his energy and joy, to use what he created in order to send him again into the world."

Next week, fittingly, on the 20th anniversary of the death of another young Israeli soldier who fell defending his fellow countrymen, Yoni Netanyahu, I shall publish excerpts from Alex- Building a Life.

Jewish war vets honor police

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – The foyer and main hall of Beth Avraham Yoseph Synagogue in Thornhill was a sea of ribbons, regalia and military and police finery recently, when the Jewish War Veterans of Canada held a Police Appreciation Night gala dinner.

"This evening is meant as a tribute to the men and women who risk their lives so that we may enjoy the quality of life that we all share," said co-emcee Hy Shulman, one of many speakers to praise the police. But perhaps U.S. Consul Dean Dizikes said it best:

"I've never felt so safe in my life as I have in Canada," Dizikes said. "All we ask of the police is that they never fail to catch the guilty party and they never harass an innocent bystander. And they must do this every day. They're easy to take for granted."

The banquet, which began with a number played by a kilted bagpiper, drew dozens of dignitaries including Lt.-Gov. Henry Jackman, Vaughan Mayor Lorna Jackson, Toronto Mayor Barbara Hall and North York Mayor Mel Lastman. Police from Metro Toronto and surrounding areas, as well as members of the Ontario Provincial Police and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP). Moshe Ronen and Manuel Prutschi represented the Canadian Jewish Congress.

The banquet hall was filled with badges, berets, pins, poppies, RCMP red tunics and tiny flags from the five allied nations of World War II. The white-uniformed Royal Regiment of Canada military band played everything from Rule Brittania to the theme from Schindler's List.

Maj.-Gen. Reg Lewis toasted the Queen. Sam Pasternack of the Jewish War Vets presented a cheque for $10,000 to the Ontario Police Chiefs, to be used for their favorite charity, the Special Olympics for the Specially Challenged. Trees were planted in Israel, plaques awarded, gifts exchanged and many verbal tributes paid.

"The police forces of Ontario have set a standard of excellence, not just for Ontario but for all of Canada," said Sidney Lindon, chief judge of the Ontario Court of Justice.

Candles were lit for Canada, the United Kingdom, the United States, France and the former Soviet Union for their roles in World War II, as well as to commemorate partisans, resistance and ghetto fighters.

More candles were lit to honor members of Canadian police forces killed on duty.

"When communities respect and honor us," said Toronto Police Chief David Boothby, "it makes us more determined to do things that are right and things that make this country the great country that it is."

"I can't begin to tell you how much I have appreciated the support, help, dedication and loyalty that I have always received as a police officer in Toronto from the Jewish community," said retired Toronto police chief William McCormack, who received a standing ovation.

Terrorist attacks will continue despite concessions: historian

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Terrorist attacks of the sort that saw buses being blown up in Jerusalem will increase in the future and will be directed at Jews anywhere in the world, author-historian Stephen Berk told an audience of 250 people at Beth Tzedec Synagogue recently in a talk sponsored by the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University.

"In a perverse sense, this provides another meaning to the notion of the unity of the Jewish people. Islamic terrorism is aimed at every Jewish man, woman and child. Jews in Argentina, Italy, France and England have felt it. Thank God you have not felt it in Toronto."

Israel has less control over security since it turned over the Gaza Strip and parts of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority, said the former college professor from Schenectedy, N.Y.

"The relinquishing of territory has made terrorism a greater problem. Before, when Israel controlled Gaza and the West Bank, Israel had an intelligence network that could pre-empt terrorist attacks. This is not an attack on the peace process. I'm simply stating a simple fact," he said.

In Berk's view, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat allowed Hamas and Islamic Jihad to carry out some terrorist acts. "Arafat is no fool. Arafat knows what got him to the White House lawn, what got him to Madrid, what got him certain concessions from the Israelis. It was terrorism that got him these things. So I think that Arafat wanted a certain amount of terrorism to move Israel along."

There has also been a religious component to Islamic terrorism against Israel, Berk said, since Islamic doctrine in the Koran asserts that the Jews are an inferior and marginal people. For many Arabs, he said, the establishment of the Jewish state "is a great stain in the honor of the Arab people."

"Given the difficulties of the contemporary Middle East and the desire of many Arabs to gravitate to the orbit of extreme fundamental Islam, there will be more organizations like Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad, saying the only way out is more attacks on Jews," he said.

A dramatic change in terrorism occurred in the 1980s with the advent of state-sponsored terrorism by such nations as Libya, Syria and Iran, Berk said. Citing the raid at Entebbe, he reminded listeners that Israel is the only country prepared to defend and rescue Jews anywhere in the world.

"We owe a debt of gratitude to Israelis for their remarkable achievement" of founding a vibrant, viable and successful Jewish state, he said.

"Decency demands that we help the Jewish victims of terrorism," he said. "Decency demands that we come to their assistance, but so too does Jewish tradition. We should not stand by when Jewish blood is shed."

Campus projects get grants

TORONTO — Three Jewish campus projects run under the auspices of Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto have each received a significant grant from Hillel International, the Washington, D.C.-based international umbrella body for Jewish campus organizations.

- The 1996 Canadian Jewish Law Student Association (CJLSA) Leadership Development Conference received the Jacob Burns Endowment in Ethics Campus Grant.
- The Jewish Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Peer Support Group was awarded funding to publicize its work. Hillel indicated the program would be a model for other campus groups across North America.
- Funding has also been awarded for a student-led International Jewish Film Festival to be held this fall at the University of Toronto. The festival is being developed by U of T's Jewish Student Union in conjunction with other organizations and academic departments.

Zac Kaye, director of JCS and a recipient of a Shalom Hartman scholarship to attend the annual seminar for campus professionals at the Hartman Institute in Jerusalem this July, said he is delighted at the diversity and quality of the programs that the various campus groups submitted.

Israel said singled out for unfair UN treatment

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – The United Nations (UN) ignores some of the world's worst human rights violations while it continues to brand Israel as a flagrant abuser of human rights, says Anne Bayefsky, an expert on international human rights and a law professor at the University of Ottawa.

Although attitudes at the UN have warmed slightly towards Israel since the Oslo accord of 1993, Israel is still "subject to treatment unlike any of the 185 member states," said Bayefsky in a recent luncheon address to the Jewish Civil Rights Educational Foundation at the Park Plaza Hotel.

"Israel's enemies have recognized human rights as a vehicle to attack Israel," she said. "The UN serves as a stage for this campaign .... It's a breeding ground for anti-Semitism and neither the medium nor the strategy of anti-Semitism has changed since the signing of the Oslo accord."

Some four out of 10 special reports on human rights issued by the UN secretary-general focus on Israel, and the UN Human Rights Commission has put Israel at the top of its agenda for the last 20 years, Bayefsky noted.

"You must remember that for 17 years, until five years ago, the self-determination of the Jewish people was called racism," she said. The same states which put Israel at the centre of human rights abuse are themselves the worst violators of human rights. ... Israel is the classic diversionary tactic."

Since the signing of the Oslo accord, hostile resolutions towards Israel from the UN General Assembly (GA) have decreased by one-third, the language of the resolutions has been moderated and the GA has passed a resolution supporting the peace process, Bayefsky noted.

However, Israel has been refused entry into both the Asian and the Western nations regional groups at the UN, which "means exclusion from the vast number of UN posts and bodies. This exclusion is a clear breach of the UN's obligation to secure the sovereign equality of all its members."

As well, Israeli diplomats prior to Oslo were "treated like lepers in the context of UN society. They weren't invited to UN functions and they weren't spoken to .... That attitude has changed. In the last few years they're getting dinner and luncheon invitations and they're being treated more like human beings."

Asked why Israel should stay at the UN, Bayefsky asserted that to quit the world body "would be a capitulation to those states that specifically seek to marginalize Israel today. Israel should take a more active role at the UN than it does, and refuse to be marginalized."

The UN's many resolutions against Israel "harm Israeli interests in the long term," Bayefsky said.

"I can't see how it is irrelevant that for 30 years there has been an incessant campaign to libel Israel as the archetypal violator of human rights in the world today.

"It has made a difference to Western attitudes towards Israel, and they play themselves out in the long haul," she said

Croatia's plans concern community

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish community of Croatia is "very concerned" over new policy directions adopted by the country's government that are an attempt to whitewash its fascist past, a visitor to that Balkan nation said here recently.

Croatian President Franjo Tudjman has announced plans to rebury the remains of Ustashe fascists at the Jasenovac concentration camp where hundreds of thousands of Jews, Serbs and Gypsies were their victims, said Esther Bem-Guth, vice-chair of Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region.

Bem-Guth, a native of Croatia who recently returned from a 16-day visit, said members of the country's Jewish community are outraged by that proposal and they point to other developments that are equally disturbing.

They noted that a new law being considered by Croatia's parliament seeks to offer compensation for properties that were confiscated by the Communists after 1945. That would in effect compensate Ustashe fascists who seized Jewish-owned property in 1941 and leave Jewish heirs and the community out in the cold, she said.

In addition, the community continues to participate in annual protests over the renaming six years ago by Tudjman of Zagreb's Square of the Victims of Fascism, where Jews were rounded up and deported to concentration camps. It is now called the Square of Croatian Heroes, which refers to their Ustashe killers, she said.

Other developments that concern the Jewish community are the wide availability of books written by Ante Pavelic, the head of the wartime Ustashe government, and Tudjman's plans to eventually return Pavelic's remains from Spain and rebury them in Croatia.

Sweetheart business deals

Tudjman has surrounded himself with wealthy expatriate fascists who are benefitting from sweetheart business deals arranged with like-minded sympathizers in government and private enterprise, Bem-Guth said.

The community is facing "a touchy moment" due to the direction being taken by the government and an apparent revival of Croat ultra-nationalism, she added.

Tudjman, who once told a reporter that he thanked God his wife was neither Jew nor Serb, has been criticized in some Zagreb newspapers for his desire "to reconcile Ustashe murderers with their victims and to make it look like all were equally victims," Bem-Guth said.

The plan to rebury Ustashe men at Jasenovac is "like reburying the bones of SS officers in Auschwitz," she added.

Slavko Goldstein, former president of the Jewish community, has written to Tudjman to complain about the recent developments and the community's current leader, Ognjen Kraus, spoke out against the renaming of the square at an annual rally that's held there on May 9.

While the Jewish community is concerned over political trends in Croatia, there is no mass exodus of people. The population remains steady at around 1,000, mostly in the capital Zagreb. Some Jews who fled Sarajevo remain in the city but most have been relocated in Israel, Europe and elsewhere, Bem-Guth said.

Bem-Guth, who was hidden by Italian farmers during the Holocaust, said she was impressed by the Zagreb Jewish community's "vibrancy." Its annual Passover seder is well attended, it maintains a kindergarten with a Hebrew teacher from Israel and it publishes an English-language magazine on local concerns. It recently published a book of commentaries that focused on World War II, she added.

Bem-Guth said the community believes it could solve many of its financial problems if the compensation law was pushed back to 1941. Prior to the war many Jews willed their property to the community but as the proposed law now stands, compensation will benefit "those who stole it from the Jews."

Ministry failed to stop internal racism: report

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It took almost six years, but Ministry of Education employee Charles Chan was finally vindicated after raising a complaint about workplace harassment that included racist threats, verbal abuse and physical assaults.

In a decision released last week, the Ontario Crown Employees' grievance settlement board found that the ministry failed to take steps to stop the harassment, did not take it seriously and even encouraged it by its feeble response.

In a scathing critique, the board suggested the ministry "had done little, if anything, to address the racist culture that had existed in the mail room for years."

The decision noted that Chan and other employees were terrorized for years by a cabal of two employees and a manager who used racist insults.

It also pointed out that the manager in the downtown mail room where Chan worked, Steve Nodillo, "had an intense hatred of Jews."

In testimony accepted by the grievance board, Chan is quoted as saying that the manager "made no secret of his intense anti-Semitic views ... He referred to Auschwitz death camp as the 'toaster oven,' the 'barbecue' and the 'smoke stack.' He often stated at work as well as outside that 'Hitler was the greatest man that ever lived.'

"In 1987, Nodillo had pictures of Hitler in uniform in his office ... He had one picture of Hitler in plain view, taped to the wall above the photocopier. In his office, Nodillo would pull out a bottle from his desk, pour a drink and make a toast saying, 'To the day Hitler died.' If anyone disagreed with his views, he would say, 'Then you can forget about applying for jobs in the mail room.' "

Other evidence indicated that one of the mail room employees, Tony Alexis, assaulted Chan on three occasions and threatened Chan and other employees at other times. (Alexis was convicted of assault in criminal court based on a complaint by Chan that the ministry said it could not act upon.)

Despite numerous complaints by Chan to Nodillo and to senior management, the board concluded that "the employer failed to deal with the complaints ... to any acceptable standard.

"Had the [ministry] treated the complaints seriously and made proper investigations, [Chan] would not have had to face the continuing harassment at the hands of Nodillo and Alexis," the board concluded.

The board criticized an internal investigation sponsored by the ministry as inadequate and found that "the manner in which the employer conducted itself, intentionally or not, encourage Alexis and other like minded people like Heinz to intensify their harassment of [Chan] subsequently."

Gary Shaul, president of OPSEU local 503, which represented Chan before the board, said none of the three who harassed Chan is employed in the ministry anymore.

He called the grievance process, which began with a complaint in 1990, had hearings spread over 2½ years and whose decision took another 2½ years to come, as "very frustrating."

"The complaints weren't taken seriously. In fact, the ministry went to a great expense to defend themselves in these actions. We always felt there were people (in the ministry) who shared Nodillo's views, who protected him or else were paralyzed and didn't know what to do," he said.

He also criticized the ministry for spending hundreds of thousands of dollars fighting the case.

Since Chan's complaint, the government has instituted anti-harassment education and reporting measures, he said, but anti-racist training had been cut off due to a lack of funding.

Reform urges end of SIRC

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Reform party is calling for termination of the civilian watchdog group that oversees Canada's spy agency and its replacement by a parliamentary committee on national security.

The Security Intelligence Review Committee (SIRC) has covered up the truth and whitewashed the activites of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) when the spy agency infiltrated the Heritage Front, charged Reform MP Val Meredith.

Writing a minority opinion in a report by the House standing committee on justice and legal affairs, Meredith stated: "It is clear there is no place in the review process for a group of patronage appointees who believe they do not have to answer to Parliament."

Meredith was referring to a report by SIRC, the civilian watchdog appointed to oversee CSIS's operations, which examined the spy agency's infiltration of the white supremacist Heritage Front by a mole, now known to be Grant Bristow.

In March 1994 the Toronto Sun reported on the infiltration of the Heritage Front by CSIS, noting that Bristow was instrumental in getting the white supremacist organization off the ground and had provided its organizational backbone.

Bristow had provoked a harassment campaign against anti-racists, had spied on members of the Jewish community and had convinced Reform to hire Heritage Front members to provide security.

Heritage Front members were also seen at Reform events, prompting Reform spokespersons to claim there was a campaign to discredit the party, which was vying for political support with the then-ruling Conservative party.

Following news reports of Bristow's infiltration of the Heritage Front, SIRC examined the case and reported to its parliamentary masters that while there were some excesses, infiltrating a potentially dangerous white supremacist group did pay dividends.

Meanwhile, Parliament's subcommittee on justice and legal affairs conducted its own investigation and its report was released last week. The majority wrote that the committee "based its work on a detailed, critical consideration of the SIRC report ... In the subcommittee's view, the leadership of the extreme right and its most prominent emerging organization, the Heritage Front, were appropriately targeted."

Referring to the CSIS mole, which the majority declined to identify as Bristow, the committee recommended that "the ministerial direction on confidential human resources be further revised so as to clearly prohibit ... human sources from engaging in illegal or discreditable [conduct] ... Harassment, intimidation, or incitement to violence on the part of a human source should be prohibited."

The majority of the committee also questioned "whether the presence of a CSIS source or sources was a positive factor in the growth of the Heritage Front" and suggested that "SIRC could have more effectively pursued this issue."

The majority of the committee noted that "the source" had begun associating with white supremacists in 1987. CSIS concluded in 1990-91 that "extreme right wing organizations and their related activities were viewed as petty criminal in nature and not to constitute a threat to the security of Canada." That raised the question of the continued need to infiltrate the Heritage Front, the committee stated.

Turning to a threat of possible violence against leaders of the Jewish community, which law enforcement did not communicate to the community leadership, the committee recommended creation of a notification procedure.

A third, joint dissenting opinion prepared by the Bloc Quebecois and Reform, found that Bristow was key to the strength of the Heritage Front. "Had the source not been part of the Heritage Front leadership, its activities might only have been petty criminal in nature and the investigation would have been terminated at an early time," their conclusion states.

In a fourth, dissenting view presented solely by the Bloc Quebecois, MP Francois Langlois writes that former solicitor general Doug Lewis "perceived the Reform party as a threat to his own party and at the very least condoned CSIS's targetting of the Reform party as a threat to Canada's security.

"It must be stated clearly that the Reform party has suffered political damage because of the Heritage Front affair and that this operation was viewed sympathetically, if not authorized, by the very highest levels," Langlois wrote.

The Bloc MP goes on to write that SIRC witnesses refused to cooperate with the parliamentary committee and their evidence was characterized by "mental evasion" and "contempt of Parliament."

Education as safeguard

Spring brings summer. Usually, the end of spring changes into the beginning of summer almost invisibly, as subtly as light green metamorphoses to dark green or a windbreaker substitutes for a parka.

But the end of spring also brings the end of the school year. In most communities across this country, the end of the school year means that students will be graduating, reaching higher on the ladder of life to another educational rung.

Some graduations are relatively simple affairs as when senior kindergarten evolves into Grade 1 or elementary school into middle and high school. Some graduations are more sombre, marked with special ceremonies in which the graduates are older and are asked to wear special robes befitting the occasion. Sometimes they even wear special hats. These graduations are often called convocations.

But whatever they are called and whatever the extent of the ceremony, all graduations are significant moments for the graduates, their teachers, their families and their community.

For the youngest graduates, the occasion will mark a change from sitting in circles to sitting in rows; building blocks give way to reading blocks. For some it will mean stepping out of the relatively moderate pressures of middle school to the relatively severe pressures of high school. For others it will mean leaving the familiar ways of high school for the unknown ways of university or college or a job. For the oldest graduates it will mean settling into "life" with a degree or two of uncertainty, eventually building a home and, after a time, guiding their own young graduates in the first tentative steps toward that imposing ladder.

Education is the very bedrock into which every precious pillar of our society is embedded and the means by which the values of our civilization are safeguarded. Therefore to all who are graduating we extend deep-felt congratulations. Graduation is an achievement worthy of note and of pride. And to all whose life's-work is teaching our children, the educators, we convey our gratitude.

And as best hope

We also make special note of and congratulate the graduates and the educators within the Jewish school system. For, in addition to being guardians of civilization's highest values, they are the guardians of Jewish values, the next links in the chain of Jewish history, the next line of Judaism's perpetuators.

Most community leaders have finally concluded that Jewish education is the key to ensuring " Jewish continuity," still the chief topic of debate at federation tables across North America. It is for good reason that continuity remains the chief topic. In 1939, the global Jewish population was approximately 18 million. Six years later, the number had been brutally reduced to approximately 12 million. Today, more than 50 years after the war, that number still hovers near 12 million. Thus the Jewish people stand at a crossroad. The path we take on our march to the horizon of the next millenium will determine whether there will be enough of us to join the march a century later.

Whenever the debate on continuity is finally resolved, it is our fervent hope that our leaders will understand that the true test of our commitment to Judaism and to the Jewish people will not be measured by how much we receive and retain from our parents, but rather, by how much we pass on to our children.

In congratulating the graduates within the Jewish school system, it is therefore imperative that we also acknowledge they are our best hope of ensuring the march will continue from one generation to the other.

Do you own land in Israel?

Between the two world wars, Jewish people, especially residents of Eastern Europe, acquired plots of land in Israel, known in those days as Palestine.

The purchase of land was made with both the intention of fortifying the Zionist settlement in Palestine and the intention of coming to the country and finding in it a foothold.

It has to be noted, however, that most of those people never saw Israel, since the purchase was carried out by proxy.

The Holocaust put a tragic end to such intentions and dreams. Most of the buyers of land died during the war, not having told their kin about the purchase.

In the course of my work, I have traced about a hundred plots of land in the region of Haifa, including the names of their rightful owners, but unfortunately, I have managed to trace only a small number of legal heirs to those plots of land.

It is reasonable to assume that some of the offsprings of the land owners had emigrated to your country after the war, with no inkling of their legacy in Israel. I have a list of names of some of the land owners.

Crucial role of Rabbi Samuel Cass

I was most interested in the article by Shira Herzog (CJN Jan. 25) in connection with the debate between her father, Ambassador Yaacov Herzog, and Arnold Toynbee.

The article was beautifully written, but there was one glaring omission, the name of Rabbi Samuel Cass, who at the time was director of the Hillel Foundation at McGill University. Rabbi Cass was delighted that Herzog had consented to debate Toynbee. He immediately offered the facilities of the Hillel Foundation and he became the go-between who negotiated between Herzog and Toynbee.

Mayor promotes Israel trade

I wish to commend Mayor Pierre Bourque for his recent visit abroad. The fact that our mayor has chosen to go on an economic mission to Israel is a clear indication that he is very much concerned about the future economic development and potential of his city.

Several economic trade deals are being arranged between Israeli and Montreal firms. These contacts can help to benefit both sides as Canada and Israel enter on a free trade agreement scheduled to begin early next year.

Religion in Israel after the election

Faith cannot be coerced

By RABBI ISMAR SCHORSCH

We teach our children the following midrash: When God completed the Torah, He offered it to the various nations. Each rejected the Torah in turn. But when God came to the Israelites, they chose to say yes; they answered Naaseh v'nishmah (We will do and we will listen).

My belief is that Conservative Judaism is the most authentic contemporary expression of rabbinic Judaism. But I know that only a variety of choices will offset the chaos of individual freedom. The State of Israel belongs to all Jews – secular or religious, Conservative, Reform or Orthodox – and is not the preserve or monopoly of any single sector of the Jewish people. The recent national elections endanger that sacred principle.

With one-quarter of the new Knesset being Orthodox, the likelihood is that there will be more religious coercion and exclusivity, not less. An assertive Knesset can render the Supreme Court ever less effective in protecting the rights of the victims of religious discrimination. The exceedingly modest progress toward religious pluralism for Jews, achieved at great cost and anguish over the past few years, is now imperilled by legislative initiative and administrative sabotage.

I fear the following dire consequences: the new Knesset will move swiftly to plug the loophole in the law identified by the Supreme Court on conversion; funds for religious alternatives in education will be cut; and more American Jewish leaders will foolishly call for the dismantling of American Jewry's greatest organizational achievement, the United Jewish Appeal, the very embodiment of unity in diversity.

In this brave new Israel, conversion is declared a part of the religious monopoly exercised by the Chief Rabbinate, despite the past harm inflicted on the national welfare by slighting the Ethiopians and stonewalling the large number of prospective Russian converts. The Chief Rabbinate claims the authority to review the conversion of any immigrant from abroad, threatening to discredit the vast majority of conversions done annually in the United States and provoking a replay of the bitter 1988 confrontation over "Who is a Jew?"

Less visible but no less harmful is the threat to alternative education. Championed in the past years by Israel's Ministry of Education and spearheaded by the Conservative Movement, alternative education in the Israeli public school system has been embodied by our TALI (the Hebrew acronym for enriched Jewish studies, tigbur limudei yahadut) schools.

TALI school curricula strengthen religious studies for the 75 percent of Israeli children who attend public schools. TALI schools today include more than 10,000 youngsters and their actively engaged parents. Curricula, teacher training and inspiration are provided by the Seminary of Judaic Studies in Jerusalem, the Israeli affiliate of the Jewish Theological Seminary.

The recent Shinhar report confirmed the abysmal failure of both Orthodox and secular educators to transmit even a modicum of knowledge and love of Judaism to the bulk of Israel's Jewish youth. Given the new political order, I fear the funding for this search for alternative models of Jewish education will soon be quietly reduced, if not eliminated.

Pluralism must be practised both in the Knesset and the classroom. No amount of coercion will erase religious diversity or restore the alleged conformity of the ghetto.

As Conservative Jews, we do not want to be stripped of our religious identity when we make aliyah. The disparagement of our rabbis and synagogues and the scrutinization of our marriages and conversions by a fundamentalist rabbinate cannot be tolerated.

There is another midrash in which God coerced our ancestors at Mt. Sinai to accept the Torah by holding the mountain ominously over their heads. As every parent knows, force is a misguided tactic in a long educational process. In an open society, Jewish pride and practice can only be rooted in the soil of personal conviction. Faith cannot be coerced.

Orthodoxy brings unity

By RABBI MOSHE SHERER

The wringing of hands is so intense it is almost audible.

The strong showing by religious parties in the recent Israeli elections has elicited cries of dismay and anguish by Reform, Conservative and secular Jewish spokespeople who rail against the "Orthodox monopoly" in the Holy Land. Most galling to these proponents of "Jewish religious pluralism" is that the increased Orthodox presence in the Knesset will likely assure that matters of personal status — marriage, divorce, Jewish identity — will continue to be determined in Israel in accordance with the standards of classical Jewish religious law. The likely reaffirmation of the state's official embrace of Orthodoxy, they despair, will foster further divisions among a Jewish people desperately in need of unity.

The truth, however, is quite to the contrary: genuine Jewish unity is promoted, not underminded, by Israel's adherence to Orthodox standards governing personal status; and it is cause for celebration, not consternation, that Israel's electorate has strengthened the hand of those who favor retention of the religious status quo.

Consider the most basic issue of Jewish identity. All Jews accept, and have accepted for thousands of years, that anyone born to a Jewish mother or who converts to Judaism in accordance with Jewish law is a Jew.

In recent years, however, non-Orthodox groups have decided to expand the definition. Most notably, the Reform movement has unilaterally declared that anyone born to a Jewish father is a Jew, regardless of the mother's religious identity. Also, both the Reform and Conservative movements have loosened standards for conversion. As a result of these "innovations," countless thousands of people the world over are in a religious Twilight Zone: counted as Jews in certain segments of the Jewish community, but as gentiles in others.

The same is true with respect to the issues of marriage and divorce.

Faced with such pronounced differences within the Jewish community on the most fundamental issues of personal status, what path is available to the Jewish State that is most likely to promote unity? The path of "religious pluralism," whereby Israel would embrace standards that deviate from classical Jewish teaching and are flatly rejected by many Jews the world over? Or the historical path of Jewish law, whereby the State would adhere to the one set of standards over whose acceptability there is no controversy whatsoever?

The answer was self-evident even at the very founding of the Jewish State to no less a secularist than David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister. In making his historic commitment to the Agudath Israel World Organization that the new state would look to classical Jewish law in determining matters of personal status, Ben-Gurion wrote of the urgent need "to avoid the splitting of the Jewish people." The need is surely no less urgent today.

We Orthodox Jews are profoundly pained by the schismatizing of the Jewish population. We are, moreover, deeply saddened to hear ourselves blamed for Jewish disunity when we have done nothing but try to remain faithful to the collective Jewish heritage. Pointing an angry finger at the Orthodox as the instigators and perpetuators of division, we feel, is like blaming a faithful spouse for the breakup of a marriage. The fault lies with those who have strayed.

But we have hope. What is broken can be put together again. Jews of all stripes are beginning to recognize that the greatest challenge facing Jews today is how to assure Jewish continuity — the survival of Jews in future generations as a distinctive people with a distinctive heritage and a distinctive religious mission.

With that recognition, perhaps, will come reconciliation. For just as classical Judaism furnishes the one personal status standard around which all Jews can coalesce, so too does it furnish the one foundation on which Jewish continuity can be assured.

Rabbi Sherer is the president of Agudath Israel of America and chair of the Agudath Israel World Organization.

A setback to pluralism

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The election of the Netanyahu government in Israel is the worst blow to the Conservative and Reform movements in that country since its establishment in 1948.

That's the opinion of Rabbi Eric Yoffie of New York, new president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), who visited Toronto June 14. He spoke to The CJN before announcement of the coalition in Israel.

The new government, with its support from Orthodox religious elements, represents a setback to pluralistic movements in Israel and a setback to those Jews in the Diaspora who believe in Zionism but not Orthodoxy, he said.

"Netanyahu must remember he is not only the prime minister of Israel but the leader of all Jews in the Diaspora," Rabbi Yoffie said.

The Reform movement has sent messages to Knesset committees and to the new prime minister himself warning against any moves to discriminate against Reform and Conservative groups in Israel, he said.

Though Netanyahu's early statements are modestly encouraging, expressing support for the status quo, Rabbi Yoffie said he is not interested in gestures, but awaits the composition of the coalition government of concrete evidence of what the future holds.

Opinions

Give Netanyahu a chance

"Peace Begins at Home" were the headlines the day after Benjamin Netanyahu made his victory speech to his Likud supporters. These words of his were those of a statesman. And his statesmanship reached a height when he thanked Shimon Peres. Indeed, he managed to stop the audience when they booed, turned them around and made them understand. Even I was surprised. I have known the elder Netanyahu for many years, a respected professor of Jewish Studies. I dedicated a book to the memory of the Entebbe hero Yoni, Benjamin Netanyahu's brother. And, last but not least, I have never forgotten Netanyahu's own talent as shown by his service at the United Nations and elsewhere.

By Emil Fackenheim

His words are just what the present situation needs. Israelis have been polarized since the early 1980s, with the "right's" Lebanon venture. But the polarization has been radicalized by the "left's" Oslo accord of the early 1990s. The Lebanon venture could be — and was — reversed. But the Oslo one is irreversible. And the extremists on the Israeli left have boasted about it.

My own monthly letters to The CJN have been motivated far less by doubts about Oslo itself than by the undemocratic manner in which the Rabin-Peres government went about enacting it. I then guessed — correctly, as it turned out — that fully one-half of Israelis consider the Oslo accord too risky, its goal far too vague, with the danger that it might weaken Israel and thus lead to war rather than to peace. Yet until now, the population was not given the chance to vote on it.

Now that the votes are in, will the new government make an effort to end the Israeli polarization? If trying, will it succeed? And will it manage the numerous obvious problems? It deserves a chance, certainly from the other half in Israel and, just as certainly from the Diaspora.

Will it be given that chance by the world and its media? Right now it does not look promising. Even prior to the election Netanyahu was hectored that, in case per impossibile he won, he must abide strictly by every one of the Oslo terms, for Israel is no banana republic. Yet she was treated precisely as such, even by the friendly United States, whose president tried so grossly to influence the Israeli electorate. (Perhaps this backfired.)

As for Europeans, fond as they always are of hectoring Israel to take "risks for peace" they would never take themselves, I do not know where to start, but presently give the cake for bias-cum-hypocrisy to British Foreign Secretary Malcolm Rifkind. Just six days before the election, in an obvious attempt to influence it, he told a Palestinian group that Britain had pioneered the doctrine of the "inadmissibility of the acquisition of territory by war," and hence of the Israeli conquest in 1967 of East Jerusalem. He went on to say that Britain had a special "responsibility" with this and other problems, harking back as they did to the British mandate. He did not mention that, when Jordan conquered East Jerusalem in 1948, only two countries recognized its legitimacy, Pakistan and Britain.

The obvious start for Israel's new foreign policy is the demand that, if Israel must stay with Oslo, Arafat must mend his many breaches of it. Has he changed the covenant that asks for Israel's destruction? He says he has, and Peres has agreed as has the world; in fact he has merely (in Charles Krauthammer's colorful phrase) sold the same "rug" yet another time. Has he delivered to Israel murderers of Israelis and Jewish visitors? He has ignored Israel's repeated demands and Israel has let him get away with it. Are the territories evacuated by Israel, then, sanctuaries for murderers?

A newly firm policy toward PLO breaches of the Oslo accord might also breathe new life into Zionism. We have heard too much about "post-Zionist" Israel, about abolishing the Law of Return, and about a Jerusalem undivided like Berlin, and otherwise a mideastern Hong Kong. We have heard even about Israel joining the Arab League. (This produced the contemptuous reply that it must become Muslim first.) Is it not time to remember that Israel's return to Jerusalem in 1967 was the deepest Jewish experience of modern times, and that it united Jews left and right, religious and secular, in Israel and the Diaspora?

Netanyahu's victory meeting began with the singing of Jerusalem of Gold. We had not heard it for a long time. It was good to hear it again.

Comments on the Israeli elections

One of the myths that Jews carried with them into the modern world is that we are a united people. We love to sing: "Behold how good and pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together" and to join the reader in the final words of the prayer: "All of Israel are friends, and let us say 'Amen.' "

By David Hartman

However gratifying and inspiring these words are, we should not confuse prayer and song with descriptions of everyday reality.

For many of us, Jerusalem represents the unity of the Jewish people. The Law of Return welcomes all Jews by giving formal expression to the essential meaning of our national renaissance: Jews are no longer the eternal wanderers of Western civilization.

We now have a home which is ours by right. In this sense, Israel signifies the end of exile, the end of living at the mercy of others.

Despite this sense of shared historical fate and our emotional attachment to the myths of unity and friendship, the bitter truth is that the Jewish people is deeply divided. Not all Jews are friends or dwell together in peace. The arguments and disagreements among us are profound and genuinely divisive, sometimes vicious and even deadly.

Our country has gone through an election process which exposed deep-seated distrust and resentment among many groups in Israeli society. One group is viewed as the enemy of peace; the other, as a threat to our historic destiny. All agree that fanaticism is a real threat to Jewish continuity: the right points to the secular hedonism of the left, and the left, to the religious fundamentalism of the right.

Unfortunately, the spirit of delegitimization did not disappear with the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. As the Bible shows repeatedly, Jews are a stiff-necked people who learn nothing from dramatic events.

The message of the biblical story of the golden calf is that there are no quick solutions to complex human problems. Abraham Joshuah Heschel cautioned against thinking that administrative techniques could solve spiritual dilemmas.

What is needed is the wisdom to create a society where we listen to one another with respect, where we appreciate the importance of diversity and the complexity of our national and cultural destiny.

Ours is an epochal period of history. Can we find a language of peace to communicate with the Palestinians and our neighbors? In spite of the important breakthrough of the Rabin and Peres government, the term "New Middle East" better describes our hopes than our reality. Hatred and demonization have not been uprooted, let alone transformed.

Ezekiel's image that God will transform hearts of stone into hearts of flesh implies the futility of quick, overnight solutions to the dilemmas of human history. When not totally skeptical of human efforts to change history, the prophet realized that the tasks facing the political leader were not easy. If change required the miraculous intervention of an all-powerful, all-knowing Being to radically transform human nature, then what should we expect from human leaders whose vision and abilities are far more limited?

It is important to pray for universal friendship and peace because that is what we aspire to. Yet, the best advice for those who dream of all of Israel being friends and of our living in peace with the Palestinian people is that we have enormous patience and the capacity to tolerate and listen to different points of view.

What we need today is sober political discourse. Our educational philosophy, therefore, must counteract the hysteria of trying to create consensus by delegitimating differences of opinion. We must teach our children that we may share a common text, yet we may understand its message differently. Differences of opinion may reflect genuine differences of interpretation rather than obstinacy and malice.

As the Tosefta remarks (with respect to the enormous amount of disagreements in the Talmud): "You should divide your heart into many rooms and compartments so that different opinions can reside in different parts of your heart." In other words, conflicting voices can and should resound within your soul.

The realization of this ideal is certainly difficult and for some, unrealistic. Yet there is an urgent need for this educational process to begin now, not tomorrow. We must face the dangers of internal hatred and distrust squarely and heed this plea for sanity and maturity.

Icon speaks

A close friend of mine recently sent the printed transcript of a talk given by one of the most admired Jewish figures in the world. That man is not a politician or a scientist. His fame rests on his modern yet traditional interpretation of the Talmud, which he has made available to tens of thousands of people who would never have thought of studying the ancient document. The scholars's name is Rabbi Adin Steinsaltz, and it is fair to say that in many circles, he has become a living icon — a figure of which one speaks with awe and admiration.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

About a month prior to the recent Israeli elections, he delivered a talk at the King David Hotel in Jerusalem about the dangers that were facing Jews in Israel and the Diaspora. According to him, the greatest problem confronting our people is the loss of our identity, which is to say that we do not know who we really are when we say that we are Jews. We are so busy with other things, and one of them, he pointed out, is that we hate each other. The problem of polarization is replacing the problem of continuity. According to Rabbi Steinsaltz, the way we feel about Jews who disagree with us on important or even fundamental matters has gotten out of hand and has become a self-destructive mechanism that imperils our future.

People are worried about what is happening in the State of Israel. Rather, he says, we should worry about what is happening in Eretz Israel, which is defined not so much by political borders and land claims as by a spiritual stance.

"People are not worried about what is happening in the State of Israel, but what is going to happen to the Jews living east of the former Green Line. Of course everyone — rabbis, generals, politicians — knows the answers; they are not the same answers, but everyone knows exactly what will happen in one, two or 10 years from now. I cannot mix in the company of such 'knowers.' And also, I am far more worried about what is happening on the west end side of the Green Line. The certainty which each of us seems to have according to one's convictions has become a barrier for building a constructive community."

Rabbi Steinsaltz is an icon that speaks — and speaks to me. The fact that I happen to live in the Diaspora makes no difference to him, for the problems here are the same as in Israel. Here, as there, we encounter what he calls "a new hatred."

"It is always attached to the highest ideas, the loftiest notions, even to the name of the Almighty. But hate is like a cancer in the body of the nation: wherever its starting point may be, it invariably spreads all over."

Alas, it has spread to North America as well. There was a time, for instance, when I used to sit down for discussions with people who greatly differed with me on religious matters. Somehow this has not happened during the last 10 years. It is the kind of symptom to which Rabbi Steinsaltz addresses himself. Fortunately it is something that lies within our power to alter for our common sake.

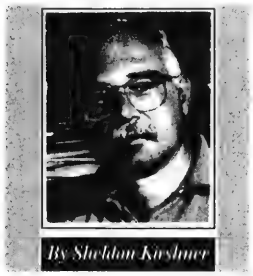
Ron Mann - Canada's master documentarian



When Ron Mann was 13, his aunt gave him a Super 8 camera as a bar mitzvah present. It unalterably changed his life.

From that moment, he knew, in his heart of hearts, that he was destined to be a film-maker.

Mann completed his first film — a short documentary about Toronto's Yonge Street — when he was still in Grade 8. At 16, with savings amassed from a summer job, he produced a longer film about a group of teenagers who lived in the shadow of a smoky gypsum factory.

When he was 17, Mann started attending the annual Cannes Film Festival in France, sleeping on the beach at night to stretch his shoestring budget. He was clearly obsessed. "I wanted to see films from sunrise to sunset," he said the other afternoon in an interview.

Mann, now 37, veered away from film while immersing himself in an undergraduate course of studies at Bennington College, York University and the University of Toronto. But after leaving the U of T with a BA in political philosophy, he returned to his first love.

Since then, through his company, Sphinx Productions, Mann has made a number of short films, several major documentaries and a few CD-ROMs, all dealing with North American popular and alternative culture.

In doing so, Mann has become one of Canada's foremost documentary film-makers, known for a quirky style which defies convention and revels in iconoclasm and irony. In recognition of his status, Cinematheque Ontario recently staged a retrospective of his work, Mann Made.

Among Mann's finest films are Imagine the Sound, a paean to the free jazz movement of the 1960s; Poetry in Motion, a tribute to his favorite performance poets; Comic Book Confidential, a Genie-award winning glimpse into a much-maligned art form; Twist, a history of rock and roll; and Dream Tower, an examination of the rise and fall of Rochdale College, the ultimate symbol of Canadian counter culture.

Mann, though dishevelled in appearance, is a perfectionist with respect to his craft. In general, it takes him a year to turn out a documentary. "They're the hardest kind of films to make," he said. "There's still no formula."

Mann, whose films have been distributed worldwide, never uses a central narrator, a standard device of the genre. "It's condescending," he claimed. "I want to treat an audience intelligently."

His films, he explained, are not objective, even if such a quality exists. "For me, documentaries are a form of propaganda and disinformation. I have a missionary-like approach to films, which is why I try to keep them as entertaining as possible."

Mann owes a great deal to his late mentor, Emile de Antonio, the maverick New York-based documentarian (Mr. Hoover and I) whose independent position "was light years away from commercial Hollywood and mainstream TV."

De Antonio, Mann mused, was not only a teacher but a friend. "He had a profound influence on me. He gave me self-confidence. He taught me about the world and helped me with my values. He was sort of my rabbi. He was a bohemian character out of a Henry Miller novel. The FBI had a big file on him and he was on (Richard) Nixon's hate list."

Mann, however, has not embraced de Antonio's far-left political agenda. "I'm really more of a humanist," observed Mann, who is married to a nutritionist and has three children. "I believe in the 1960s jargon that people can live together. If anything, I'm a liberal and a utopian."

Working out of a shabby red-brick industrial building near the Skydome, Mann has just finished two documentaries, both for television: a segment in a series on the 1950s and a history of marijuanna.

Ron Mann

Although Mann has never made a film with a Jewish theme, he intends to remedy that omission in the future. Topics which pique his interest run the gamut from Zionist pioneers in Palestine to cantors.

Mann, who attended the Associated Day School, was born in Toronto, the son of Harold and Amy. A Polish Jew, Harold survived the war in the Soviet Union, immigrating to Canada in the early 1950s via Cyprus and Israel. Until some years ago, he was the proprietor of Mann's TV & Stereo. Amy, a painter, was a Latvian Jew and a concentration camp survivor.

From a financial point of view, Mann is faring extremely well these days. But not too long ago, he was struggling. "My way of making films was to go into debt, raise money for the next film to pay off the debts incurred in making the earlier film, and then go straight into debt again to make a new film."

Despite his success, Mann has no interest whatsoever in venturing south to Hollywood. "I don't have any ambition to make anything but documentaries."

At one point in his career, he toiled briefly for the director Ivan Reitman (Ghostbusters). But he gave it all up, a $1 million, three-picture deal, because he wanted to follow his dreams and be true to "my own, passionate, young voice."

That, everyone in the industry agrees, he has done with a vengeance.

Films from the Festival

The fourth annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival ended recently. Among the films which intrigued me were The Yellow Ticket, a dusty relic, and Abraham and Eugenia, a Cuban documentary.

The Yellow Ticket, made in 1918 in Germany, features one of the stars of the silent screen, Pola Negri (1894-1987), who portrays a Jewish medical student negotiating life's hazards in pre-revolutionary Russian society.

Restored by the Israel Film Archive, this is a melodrama with a convoluted plot rife with overwrought characters and meandering flashbacks. If nothing else, it's a curiosity from a bygone age.

Abraham and Eugenia, Bonnie Burt's instructive 32-minute film, focuses on a pair of Cuban Jews who have managed to preserve their Judaism through 35 years of official atheism.

Abraham, a resident of Havana whose wife is a convert to Judaism, keeps the faith by preparing his son for bar mitzvah. Eugenia, from a city in the interior, raises her children as Jews despite her marriage to a Catholic.

Unfolding to the beat of Cuban music, Abraham and Eugenia illustrates the tenacity and resiliency of Judaism in a Marxist state.

Barbra Streisand

Barbra Streisand is probably the most versatile performer in the American entertainment industry. Her albums have sold 100 million copies. Her 15 movies have grossed over $100 million. There is, simply, no one quite like her in show business today, a versatile and beguiling woman who was once branded a mieskeit (ugly duckling).

James Spada, whose forte is profiling movie stars, has written what may well be Streisand's definitive biography. Entitled Streisand: A Life (Crown Publishers, $25 US), it is based on more than 200 interviews with friends, relatives and colleagues.

Spada leaves no stone unturned. He documents her family's East European roots. Her grandfather, Isaak, was born in Galicia. He chronicles Streisand's distant, unloving relationship with her mother. Streisand might as well have been an orphan, Spada observes. (Her father, a high school teacher, died when she was an infant). Nevertheless, Streisand bought her mother a $1 million condominium in Beverly Hills.

According to Spada, Streisand — an excellent student — was stage struck from the age of five. But it was her inimitable voice which propelled her to stardom. By 18, she was the toast of Broadway for her performance in I Can Get It For You Wholesale. Shortly afterward, she starred in the stage production of Funny Girl. By 21, she graced the cover of Time magazine.

Spada also describes her film debut, delves into Streisand's romances, including her unlikely affair with Pierre Trudeau, relates how her pet movie project, Yentl, almost floundered because it was considered too "ethnic," and chronicles her political activism on behalf of the Democratic party.

All in all, an informative book.

Tending the sick a rewarding action

By RABBI
ALLAN M. LANGNER

Our sages declared that one deed for which a person enjoys the fruit on this earth is that of visiting the sick. In the Bible, there is a vivid and striking example of the effect of such a visit.

It is related that when Jacob grew old, he became ill (an illness from which he did not recover); he was informed that his son Joseph and his grandchildren were coming to see him. This proved to be a tonic for him; for it is stated that he became strong and sat upon his bed. The mere knowledge that his progeny were about to visit enabled him to muster sufficient strength to sit up.

When the sages of old spoke of "enjoying the fruit," what they were in effect saying was that a person derives immense satisfaction and spiritual reward from performing such a deed.

Nothing is more satisfying and gratifying in the life of a rabbi than ministering to those who are stricken in body and spirit — to render aid and assistance to those who require it.

Unfortunately, visiting the sick is taken rather lightly today in this world of hustle and bustle, and in this age of automation, people are becoming more and more disinclined to visit those who are unwell. Some believe they have fulfilled their duty when they send a get well card or a plant or a box of candy. At no time, except perhaps during bereavement, is a person in greater need of human companionship than during a period of illness.

How often do people in their recuperative stages declare how much a visit at that time meant to them? There are occasions when the ailing and bedridden are unable to communicate and nary a word is passed between them and the visitor. Yet just being conscious of the presence of a friend and well-wisher can have a salutary and regenerative effect upon them. Visiting the sick must be done in person. It cannot be done by cards or flowers or chocolates. There is no substitute for a personal call.

There are others who do take the trouble to drop in but always with a stop-watch. They come for a few moments. There are times when a short visit more than suffices, depending on a person's condition. Such, however, is not true in most cases. A visit must not be timed and terminated abruptly.

We must not be unmindful of the fact that when someone is suffering from a physical malady, invariably it is accompanied by some form of mental and emotional depression. We, as laypeople, can do little to alleviate miseries, but we can do much to help the ill relieve themselves of their mental and emotional anguish. Very often a stricken person will desire to unburden himself of all that might be troubling him.

Who was it that said many people call a doctor when all they want is an audience? Here is one occasion when a great service can be rendered by being an audience — by listening and sharing a little of someone's suffering. It may not be creative, but it can prove to be a temporary palliative.

All this is not to say we must rush into paying visits indiscriminately as soon as someone is felled by sickness. Indeed, our sages cautioned us against hasty and ill-advised moves. We must exercise prudence and discretion. But we must not seize upon some flimsy excuse for staying away when a visit is in order.

For no medicine is more soothing than a personal call. It is one act from which we do enjoy the fruits of our action. It is satisfying and rewarding to both the one who is affected and the one who pays the visit.

Rabbi Langner is the rabbi emeritus of Congregation Beth-El in Town of Mount Royal, Quebec.

GOD: A Biography by Jack Miles, Random House Paperbound $21.

Is God a fit subject for biography? At first blush the notion seems irreverent, perhaps even blasphemous. Yet, the Bible teaches that male and female are created in God's image. This is an unmistakable invitation to understand Him and His behavior in human terms.

Moreover, as we read the Hebrew scriptures straight through — from Genesis to Chronicles — God undergoes subtle and even radical changes. He undergoes diverse roles as Creator, Destroyer, Liberator, Law Giver, Arbiter and Holy One. He seems to gain insights from experience and suffer from inner conflicts. Evidently, like a literary personality, He is subject to character growth and analysis.

What is astonishing about the Hebrew Scriptures is that it begins with the world in which God is actively and visibly involved but does not end that way. Gradually the Deity appears less and less to humans and speaks less and less. Miracles, angels and all other signs of Divine presence become rarer and finally disappear altogether.

Among God's last words to Moses, the Deity says, "I shall hide my face from them. I shall see what their end will be." (Deut. 31:17, 18; 32:20). He changes, as it were, from the powerful, athletic God of Michelangelo to remote and mysterious the Ancient of Days portrayed by William Blake.

After the Book of Job, God does not speak directly again in the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah and 1 and 2 Chronicles. For the most part testimony about Him replaces speech by Him. Even in Psalms, He is primarily a counsellor. Proverbs treats Him like a picture frame, marginal to the contents of the book.

For Jack Miles — an ex-Jesuit, journalist, and the holder of a degree in Near Eastern Languages — as the ancient Israelite historians, poets and theololgians became more sophisticated they ceased to endow God with human attributes and emotions. Instead they realized their inability to visualize a supreme being and pushed their conception of Him further and further from the arena of their understanding.

There are several major criticisms of the book suggested by Jewish scholars. In the first place, the author's thesis of an increasingly withdrawn God depends on the order of the Biblical books as they are now read in the Jewish tradition. Thus, he can proceed with his idea that God is at first involved, then less active and finally silent.

The end of peace process?

By SIMON ROSENBLUM

The election of Benjamin Netanyahu may unfortunately be a death warrant for the peace process. How can that be, since Netanyahu has stated that he will honor those parts of the Oslo accords that have already been implemented? It would of course be reckless to do otherwise and more to the point, Likud is perfectly content to freeze the status quo wherein the Palestinians "enjoy" a form of modified home-rule. This was understood by all concerned in the peace process as a way station to a more permanent solution which would be negotiated in final status talks dealing with borders, settlements, Palestinian sovereignty and Jerusalem.

Guest Voices

Israeli analysts understood this reality. For example, Hirsch Goodman — editor of The Jerusalem Report — wrote "Netanyahu thinks that the Oslo accords have gone too far already; that while we have to live with certain realities, the process should be nipped in the bud. In those areas already under Palestinian control, independence will go no further than autonomy and Israel will remain in charge of all security issues. Instead of compromise on Jerusalem, Netanyahu will work hard to roll back any Palestinian presence in the city."

It would be naive, of course, to think that with the election of Shimon Peres, concluding the peace process would have been a walk in the park. But a secure peace was within reach, and after difficult negotiations, it would most likely have been achieved. That would probably still have been the case, even if a weakened Peres had to broaden his cabinet.

But with Netanyahu it is a very different story. Netanyahu is very much an American-style politician and the usual tricks of the trade (polls and focus groups) were used to craft a winning message: Netanyahu too was in favor of peace — it was just that he would be a tougher negotiator. The peace process might go somewhat more slowly, but would have better results Nonsense. The floating Israeli vote — the undecideds — were conned.

Even if Netanyahu is not a captive of the far right members of his coalition, such as Ariel Sharon and Rafael Eitan, the prognosis is very poor. Indeed, I suspect that Netanyahu will endeavor to position himself as something of a centrist, supposedly representing all of Israel. So, there will probably be no radical first 100-day program, which Sharon has been devising with plans for immediate massive new Israeli settlements in the West Bank. There will be much relief in Washington and throughout the international financial community.

So much for positioning, since on the fundamentals of the peace process, the agenda will remain in all likelihood hawkish. It will become transparent within a year at most, that in spite of protestations in favor of peace, Netanyahu has no intention — unless his policies change dramatically — of trading anything of consequence for peace. In other words, while he may talk the talk he won't walk the walk.

The peace process is like riding a bicycle — you either move forward or fall off. So as the peace process atrophies, the reaction among Palestinians will be somewhat predictable. There will likely be a new intifada, and probably a more violent one at that, along with a radicalization that undermines Arafat and more moderate Palestinians. In that context, Hamas could very well be in the ascendancy.

The exact timetable and nature of these developments and the predictable Israeli military response are uncertain, but they will intensify with other incremental provocations, such as expanding Israeli settlements in the West Bank and changing the precarious status quo in Jerusalem. A vicious circle will be underway.

As regards the larger Arab world, there will also be a gradual process of deterioration. The peace agreement with Jordan may unravel and of course there will be no agreement with Syria. The Middle East will be on the slow road to war — all in the cause of "security." Netanyahu will not have cancelled the peace process, so obviously he cannot be held responsible!

Are these developments inevitable? Nothing is for certain and some members of the new cabinet, such as Natan Sharansky, recognizing that a majority of Israelis want the peace process to continue and to succeed, will be pragmatic and flexible. Pressures may well develop within Israel and throughout the Zionist movement worldwide, not to mention from the United States and the international community, placing constraints on Likud's actions and conceivably even pushing Netanyahu to modify his course and negotiate in good faith with the Palestinians. But for this to happen, people of moderate opinions and beliefs will have to engage themselves vigorously, sooner rather than later, or it will be too late for the peace process.

But before the 15th century, the order of the books in the latter Prophets and Writings were often quite different.

In the second place, it is indicated that the portions of the Hebrew scriptures, other than the Pentateuch, never assumed similar importance. "The practical, legal contours of the Jewish tradition (Halachah) could only be drawn from the Pentateuch (Torah), and it was understood that the other parts of the collection were of lesser status. Similarly, only the works of the Prophets could be read regularly in the synagogue with a blessing, while 'the writings' could not be read in this manner (with the exception of Esther). Moving forward from talmudic times, the prophets and writings were virtually never studied in most premodern Jewish schools, and a person who could be described as a 'Bible-reader' is almost non-existent."

Although not always an easy book to read, the author provides the serious and determined reader with exciting material for reflection and analysis. Evidently the approaches to understanding the Hebrew scriptures are inexhaustible.

re: Tom Harpur

It is good to learn from Tom Harpur's recent letter to The CJN that he is not an anti-Semite. I never said that he was and certainly hope not. I did wonder, however, why he used his column to spread distortions and misrepresentations of Judaism, based on a relatively obscure book by a disaffected and self-hating Jew.

Jews must keep priorities straight: Lookstein

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Jews have to keep their priorities straight, asserts Rabbi Haskel Lookstein, spiritual leader of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun and principal of Ramaz School, both in New York.

Rabbi Lookstein was speaking at a dinner at the home of Ernest and Helen Singer to celebrate the successful fundraising campaign of Associated Hebrew Schools.

American Jews during the Holocaust got bogged down in trivialities, he charged, and relegated the issue of Jewish survival in Nazi Europe to insignificance.

The examples he quoted from his book, Were We Our Brothers' Keepers? The Public Response of American Jews to the Holocaust, 1938-1944 , were chilling.

Kristallnacht, which "was front page news in the New York Times for 10 days, and was in its index for two weeks," was put on the agenda of a regular (not a special) meeting of the General Jewish Council after the census, new staff, the birthday of Judge Louis Brandeis and the choice of a new bank.

When it was revealed in a press conference in November 1942 that two million Jews had been killed in Poland and four or five million more were certainly going to be murdered, a fact that was publicized in the New York Times and other reputable publications, the Jewish Advocate of Boston, Rabbi Lookstein said, twice wrote about it at the very end of a series of editorials dealing with such matters as a luncheon, tributes to community notables and a plea to buy Christmas seals.

Jews of the time "failed to put aside other things and say that their first priority was to save Jews, that their priority was to scream, protest, do whatever had to be done."

There are two priorities in today's Jewish world, he said, "especially in the Diaspora in the face of the huge rate of intermarriage, assimilation and the decrease in the Jewish population. We must have lots of kids and we must make sure that those kids will have a Jewish education.

"The way to ensure Jewish continuity is not cholent, not gefilte fish, but to give Jewish children a Jewish education," the rabbi said.

David Posluns, who thanked Rabbi Lookstein, said that over $2 million had been raised in three months for the new Neptune campus of Associated.

"We are fiscally responsible. We need solid commitments [for the remaining half a million dollars needed] so that the branch can open in the fall of 1997."

Nellie Zagdanski, who chaired the program, praised the Neptune branch for its "commitment to Jewish education, pride, continuity and love for Israel," that it instilled in its students and "is being passed on to a new generation."

Sheldon Goodman, the first Associated day school graduate to become president of the institution, noted that the leadership has been passed to a new, younger group of parents, many of them graduates of the school, who are also involved in communal life.

Arthur Kruger, director of the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, who introduced Rabbi Lookstein, praised Associated as "a community Jewish school, that teaches but doesn't indoctrinate. Our goal is a knowledgeable and committed Jew."

The Neptune campus of Associated was established in 1956. When it was no longer economically sensible to continue repairing the facility, plans were made to build a new school, as well as an assisted housing facility, to be constructed in association with Baycrest, the Clarendon Foundation and the Kehilla Residential Program, with the help of the provincial government.

The plan was scrapped when the Harris government withdrew its financial support.

A new Neptune campus is being built with private donations, principally from the Posluns, Singer and Zagdanski families. The new facility, to be called the Louis and Leah Posluns Education Centre, is intended to be 30,000 square feet, and will include an auditorium, library, gyms and 16 classrooms on two floors accommodating 300 children.

The building will allow for a future addition of up to eight classrooms on a third floor.

Family reunion to mark 135th wedding anniversary

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Several hundred family members will gather in Toronto at the Prince Hotel on the weekend of July 5 in honor of the 135th wedding anniversary of Ruchel and Isaac Wagman (Wegman).

Milton Fields of Chicago, the family historian, has traced more than 700 of their descendants.

This will be the third international reunion for the descendants of the Wagmans, who were born in Bogoria, Poland, a shtetl 150 kilometres south of Warsaw. Married in 1861, they operated a bakery and general store and had nine children who married and moved to other shtetlach.

Fields says that following the Kishinev pogrom in 1895, recognizing the dangers of the repressive measures instituted by the Russian government, the Wagman children and their families began immigrating to America and when they were established, they brought other family members as well.

Chana Wagman, the eldest daughter of Ruchel and Isaac, married Avrom Gula in Poland. The eldest of the Gulas' 10 children, Herschel (Harry) Gula, came to Toronto in 1908 where he, his wife and eight children worked in the family bakery at Dundas and Markham.

Chana came to Toronto in the mid 1930s, but many of her siblings and other family members perished in the Holocaust.

Ruchel and Isaac's oldest son, Herschel also settled in Toronto. The expanding family of Wagmans now includes families named Finkelstein, Waldman, Warsh, Warszawski, Weigman, Stulberg and Weygman.

Ann (Gula) Picov told The CJN that at two former reunions held in Chicago, more than 300 cousins, aged 3 months to late 80s, attended the reunion.

"Family members for our four-day reunion in Toronto are coming from Brazil, Argentina, Israel, Singapore, Jamaica, Los Angeles, Chicago and other cities throughout the United States and Canada," she said.

The traditional Friday dinner will honor the eldest members of the family. Throughout the weekend, there will be slide and video presentations, and family pictures will be taken.

Artist Shelley Warsh has created a family poster for each family and a 100-page family book has been compiled with copies of Ruchel and Isaac's birth certificates dated 1837 and 1841, their marriage certificate, a family tree, a family directory, memorabilia and greetings from the prime minister of Canada, the premier of Ontario, and the mayor of North York.

Eitz Chaim students study Torah

TORONTO — It was back to school for Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (UJA Federation) chair David Goldstein and Women's Campaign chair Vicki Campbell, who recently joined Eitz Chaim students, during a day of Torah study.

The Eitz Chaim learn-a-thon, a 25-year-old tradition, raised $19,000 for young immigrants recently arrived in Israel. It coincides with the Community March for Israel.

Goldstein was assigned his own learning partner, Rabbi Mordechai Yaffe, when he dropped in at the boys school.

"It was a truly wonderful experience," said Goldstein, who got a crash course in Pirkei Avot. "It's great to see students creating their own projects to help raise money."

Campbell attended some sessions at the Eitz Chaim girls school.

Bathurst Manor gets second Rabbi Kelman

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Beth Jacob Congregation is marking the beginning of its second hundred years with the hiring of an associate rabbi, Rabbi Jay Kelman.

Beth Jacob is an Orthodox synagogue in the Bathurst Manor area of Downsview. It began as the well-known and very beautiful Henry Street shul in the Kensington Market area.

The magnificent carved wood Aron Kodesh of the Henry Street shul was dismantled and re-installed in the new building when it opened in the mid-1960s.

The current senior rabbi, Rabbi Moshe Burak, will continue his duties. Rabbi Kelman will concentrate on attracting new and, especially, younger members.

"Rabbi Burak fully supported my hiring," Rabbi Kelman said.

Rabbi Kelman, 35, whose father, Rabbi Joseph Kelman, is spiritual leader of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation across the road from Beth Jacob, was born and educated in Toronto. After studying at Yeshivat HaKotel in Jerusalem, he received smicha (rabbinic ordination), as well as his BSc in accounting from Yeshiva University.

On his return to Toronto in 1988, he worked as a chartered accountant. He has also been teaching for half a day at Associated Hebrew Schools and is the founder and organizer of the Or Chaim Kollel, which offers advanced programs in Torah study to men and women.

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Members of Beth Jacob approached him to assume his new position, he said. "I often davened there in the mornings. They talked to me around Purim, it was finalized after Pesach and I spoke for the first time on Shavuot."

His ultimate goal is to help the shul grow and to bring in young people, he told The CJN as he kept a wary eye on his 17-month-old son Ariel. (He and his wife Ilana, an occupational therapist are expecting another child soon.)

"I will be starting programs and classes (some I have already started) and will speak occasionally [from the bimah]."

There is no official job description, he said with a twinkle, "so we will have to see how it will go."

Some of his plans are a Sunday morning Halachah shiur, a parents and children's learning program, youth Shabbat and sisterhood classes. He also hopes to bring in speakers.

"I want to make Beth Jacob a more attractive place to come," he said.

He said he is open to ideas, and is anxious for people to call him with suggestions.

He laughed somewhat ruefully at the question of whether there might be some tension because of his father's shul being Conservative, while his is Orthodox.

"My father is my mentor — I learned my rabbinic skills from him. We aren't in competition.

"While there are certainly differences between the streams [of Judaism], I believe that Orthodox, Conservative and Reform Jews can work together, even if not on theological issues. While we can't deny the differences, we can be friendly to each other anyway."

Riding against racism

By MIRIAM HAWKINS
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When Canadians speak out against racism, the whole world can hear — and see.

Using a hot multimedia site on the Internet supported by dozens of top Canadian artists, Toronto activist/journalist Lisa Cherniak is making sure we Canadians aren't just practising brotherly love, we're preaching it globally. And the medium, with its selection of words and works by our authors, actors, comedians, dancers, directors and musicians, makes for a highly visible message.

Artists Against Racism (AAR), founded by Cherniak in 1992 and a winner of this year's Toronto Mayor's Award for Anti-Racism, brings together the likes of Leonard Cohen, Michael Burgess, Margaret Atwood, Celine Dion and Oscar Peterson as part of its global awareness campaign.

In addition, its Web site, which provides students and researchers on every continent with useful information and contacts, is going to hum with more than multimedia bytes from the stars.

Two cyclists, who will set off from Vancouver on Canada Day for a two-month cross-Canada marathon Peace Ride for AAR may steal the multimedia centre stage this summer.

The trek is the dream of the cyclists, who saw the AAR Web site and wanted to help raise awareness and funds for AAR projects. With a little technology and the cooperation of local Internet links, Cherniak hopes to bring to the world images of Canada and a human journey for peace with interactive video progress report on the Web. Browsers will be able to visit Canada town by town as cyclists arrive.

"A Canadian can't be described in a single color, ancestry or religion, because Canada is a multicultural society," said cyclist Scott Justason, 20.

Already some 80,000 anti-racism posters designed for AAR by Toronto's Mendelsson Joe hang in every public school and most YMCAs and libraries in the country.

Inspired by the AAR campaign, students at Maples Collegiate a Winnipeg high school, held an anti-racism day in April, raising AAR banners and funds for Peace Ride in a march against racism. Teacher Chuck Duboff is now organizing a Peace Ride reception in Winnipeg.

People can still become Peace Ride organizers, assistants or sponsors in their own communities. Check out the Web site at [http://www/vrx.net/aar] or call AAR at 416-110-5631.

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Day camps are an integral part of summer. But three sisters have come up with a new twist — Camp Menucha, a day camp for mothers.

For three weeks in July, Monday to Thursday, from 9:30 to 1:30, women in the Orthodox community, young mothers, grandmothers, even great-grandmothers, come together for exercise, Torah classes, crafts and a genuine good time.

All three are involved in the educational field — Basser and Czermak operate a play group, and Spiro teaches at Beth Jacob High School.

They founded the camp to help their mother, who was donating a sefer Torah to the Bobov shul.

"We wanted to participate [in the mitzvah of giving a Torah], so we thought we would found a business [to raise money]" said Czermak. "We decided on a ladies' camp," Spiro added, "because that's what women need."

The camp is held at Beth Jacob High School on Lawrence Avenue, "in air conditioned facilities," Spiro said.

Participants can swim in the school's pool, listen to a lecture or shiur, and then enjoy crafts, cooking or a play.

Every year is a little different, Spiro said. This year, programs being planned include yoga, quiz games, rug braiding, planting herbs, folkdancing, cooking, relaxation techniques and ceramics.

They are especially excited about Edibles in the Forest, a hike through Sunnybrook Park, which will end up at Edwards Gardens, where the women will learn about nature photography.

Panel discussions are planned on running your own business and on life in pre-war Germany.

There are even out-of-town speakers, Zlata Press, from New York, and Montreal family counsellor Rivka Katz.

Spiro said that the nicest part of the camp is the people, some of whom return every year.

"There is such variety, different ages, various backgrounds. It gets people out of their own world and lets them meet other frum (Orthodox) women. It is an opportunity to share and grow together."

For more information, call Czermak at 416-787-8123 or 416-789-9511.

Medicine is also part of camp

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Preparing a child for camp is a whirlwind of shopping, sewing on labels, borrowing things and planning how many socks will be needed in case he or she forgets to do laundry.

But expressing the child's health needs and becoming familiar with the camp's medical services are just as important.

Sylvia Spiegel and Leya Aronson are registered nurses who work at Camp Agudah, near Bracebridge. They have prepared an information sheet for parents that is chock-full of important dos and don'ts.

Spiegel spoke to The CJN while planning her nursing care for the camp.

"Always make sure that a competent person is on duty at the camp 24 hours a day," she advised. If the medical staff is a nurse, she said, be aware of what the nurse is permitted to do when no physician is around. A nurse, for instance, can remove stitches but not put them in, and can give medication but not prescribe it.

Communication is essential, she said. Make sure that the medical staff know what medication the child needs, what problems there are and who to contact and where to contact them, including the doctor who has the child's medical records.

Medication should be in the original container, properly labelled and with appropriate instructions, in the child's own name, and should (Spiegel and Aronson insist on this) be given to the camp staff to administer.

"You can't trust a 10-year-old to remember to take his medicine with all the excitement of going to camp," Spiegel said.

Don't send medicines in a camper's gear without telling the staff. "You might think sleeping pills don't count, but it's our responsibility if anything happens."

Parents may be embarassed to tell the staff about a problem the child has, or may think that since, for instance, the child has not had an asthma attack for several years, he or she won't have one at camp.

This can put the child and the camp at risk, Spiegel said.

People are more aware of allergies than they used to be. Camp Agudah, for instance, doesn't serve peanut butter because of the potentially fatal reactions to it. But again, the camp must be informed.

Don't confuse a sensitivity with a true allergy, she advised. Overstating the case may get your child unnecessarily restricted from camp activities.

It is wise to make sure that epipens are available and easily accessible in case of severe allergic reactions.

Parents should check that emergency care is available and plans are in place in case of accidents. Staff should be trained in lifesaving skills and CPR.

Parents should also know if the camp has on the premises such emergency equipment as asthma compressors or an oxygen tank.

It is important that the camp have the child's health care number, in case the child needs care outside of the camp.

Children and staff should be made aware constantly of the need for frequent handwashing, as strict cleanliness can avert infection.

Yiddish poet celebrates 75th year

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Simcha Simchovitch, "a gentle, Yiddish poet," was honored by 700 of his admirers on his 75th birthday.

Organizers of the recent event at Beth Tzedec Congregation were astounded by the huge turnout and hundreds of extra chairs were brought in.

"This is incredible," said Marjorie Rasky, who co-chaired the event with Dr. Fred Weinberg.

The evening, sponsored by the Max and Beatrice Wolfe Library, also saw the launching of Simchovitch's new book of Yiddish verse in English translation, A Song Will Remain.

It was a touching tribute to the writer born in the Polish resort of Otwotzk, who lost his family in the Holocaust and came to Canada in 1949, where he taught Yiddish and Hebrew in Montreal, Ottawa and Toronto, before becoming curator at Beth Tzedec. His wife, Freda, was presented with flowers as part of the celebration.

Coupling his name with famed Canadian Yiddish poets Melech Ravitch and Rachel Korn, Prof. Adam Fuerstenberg said Simchovitch deserves a special place, because he made a smooth transition to writing in English.

It is his epilogue to pre-war Poland, his lifting of the burden of the past and his poetical tributes to his adopted land of Canada which make him outstanding, Fuerstenberg said.

He quoted a comment by the well known Canadian critic George Woodcock on Simchovitch's work: "He does not isolate the Holocaust from the widespread horror of our times."

Shalom Village executive director retires after 27 years

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — At Shalom Village recently, tribute was paid to Sheila Burman, who retires as executive director at the end of the month.

Shalom Village was a seemingly unattainable dream 27 years ago, when Burman, then director of Jewish Social Services, realized the time when the need for a Jewish seniors' home was fast approaching. Her dream was shared by the late Ludwig Benario, a volunteer, and together the two worked tirelessly to persuade a skeptical community that the project was feasible.

One skeptic was Joyce Caygill, executive director of Placement Coordination Services of Hamilton. She could understand, Caygill said, "the cultural and spiritual need" for a Jewish home for the aged, but felt the financial expense was not justified, since only about seven Jewish seniors had applied for admission over the previous five years.

However, a generous bequest by the late Jacob Rosenstadt made the purchase of a three-storey house on Queen Street South possible, and "the problem was solved," Caygill thought. "But I hadn't reckoned with Sheila!"

Burman battled on until the 39-unit Shalom Village seniors' residence opened in 1982 and finally, in 1989, the adjoining 60-bed nursing home was built.

Shalom Village president Leslie Lasky, who chaired the evening, spoke of Burman's "love, vision and caring" that have "set Shalom Village above all other similar facilities," and made it "a leader in caregiving in Ontario."

There were tributes from residents and their families; Shalom Village and nursing home staff; director of nursing, Pat Morden, who succeeds Burman as executive director; and the eldest of Burman's three children, Geoff. Tribute was paid to her husband David, who throughout the years, supported and worked alongside his wife with equal dedication.

Shalom Village had always meant much more than just work to her, Burman said, as she thanked the community for having done "something very significant and very Jewish" in building Shalom Village and the nursing home.

Lasky presented Burman with a white marble Inuit sculpture, and Mayor Bob Morrow made a presentation on behalf of the city. Others present included Ward 1 alderman Mary Kiss, and former West Hamilton MPP Richard Allan, whose father-in-law is a resident of the nursing home.

The evening's program was relayed to the nursing home via video.

Victoria Jews shocked by cemetery desecration

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VICTORIA — The Jewish community of Victoria has been shocked by the recent desecration of its historic Jewish Cemetery, which was consecrated in 1860.

Cemetery officials say it's the first case in recent history of vandalism there, although other city cemeteries have been damaged in the past.

Police report that at least six headstones were toppled and several others damaged. Some of the toppled stones weigh well over 600 pounds, and an employee of a monument company said it would have required three men to lift them. The Holocaust Memorial cenotaph was left untouched.

Extensive repairs on the broken headstones are now underway.

The cemetery, located in a lush, immaculate park, was dedicated just two years after the first Jews arrived here, mainly from the United States. It is believed to be the oldest Jewish cemetery in Western Canada.

Morris Price, who was murdered, was the first person buried there. A small fence surrounds his grave.

The five Oppenheimer brothers, although they moved from Victoria to Vancouver, are buried in the Victoria cemetery. David Oppenheimer was mayor of Vancouver for four terms.

The brothers built Vancouver's first water supply, lighting system and street railway.

Also resting in the cemetery is Justice Samuel D. Schultz, the first Jewish judge appointed in Canada.

Winnipeg teachers retire

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Winnipeg Jewish School Teachers Association (WJSTA) and the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education (WBJE) recently honored six longtime teachers who are retiring at the end of June.

All together, Ethel Gordon, Leona Dyck, Gerry Daien, Lil Zentner, Chaim Shiel and Leon Berger have put in 185 years of service in Winnipeg's Jewish schools.

The dean of WBJE teachers, with 47 years of service, Berger began his career at the Talmud Torah when it was still located in the old north end. Over the years, he has taught Judaic studies at Talmud Torah and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate (JWC). For years, he was the driving force behind the Jewish Teachers Association, a forerunner of the WJSTA.

Shiel, who has 43 years experience, has been the vice-principal of Judaic studies at JWC in recent years. He also taught social studies and Judaic studies at the Shaarey Zedek and Ramah Hebrew School before coming to JWC.

Lil Zentner began her career at the I. L. Peretz Folk school 22½ years ago. Head of the math department for many years at JWC, she has also just completed her tenure as president of the WJSTA.

Cantor Gerry Daien, known outside the school system as well as in school, has prepared hundreds of children for their bar and bat mitzvahs over the past 30 years. He has taught synagogue skills and t'fillah at the Talmud Torah and JWC for 22 years.

Ethel Gordon and Leona Dyck have each taught for 25 years at Ramah Hebrew School in south Winnipeg. Dyck has been a Grade 3, 4 and 5 teacher over the years, while Gordon has specialized in physical education.

Each of the retiring teachers was presented with a plaque and gift.

Teenagers attend Caledon Hills kallah

CALEDON HILLS, Ont. — Twenty-seven participants in the High School Outreach Program in Ontario recently travelled to Caledon Hills Leisure Village for a four-day kallah (gathering) focusing on Jewish life in the 20th century.

The teenagers, who come from small communities ranging from Sault Ste. Marie to Barrie and from Kingston to Sarnia, are in the middle of the fourth three-year cycle of the education program of Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), Ontario region.

CJC national director of community relations Bernie Farber spoke about anti-Semitism and hate groups in the '90s, focusing on how to combat anti-Semitic acts and hate on the Internet.

Lea Kon, 15, of Guelph said it was interesting to learn "how certain groups and their members appear to be innocent and coy in their approach, but can turn out to be most harmful."

In the program, students learn by correspondence from materials sent out by Congress and from periodic visits by CJC professionals. Twice yearly, the teenagers come together at kallot for group study. The program culminates with five weeks of study and travel in Israel.

Outreach program coordinator Randie Cartman said the programs are aimed at helping the teenagers to deal with incidents in their own communities.

The kallah began with a traditional Shabbat dinner and service conducted by program participant Avi Elpern, 14, of Dundas. Active Torah games and discussion on the parshah followed.

Arielle Berger, 13, of Kingston enjoyed this kallah, she said, "because as a group, we are getting more comfortable with each other. The best thing about this program is meeting and sharing experiences with other Jewish kids living in small communities."

Just for Laughs...

To Tide Him Over

"I'm poor, Rabbi. My wife is sick and my children are hungry."

"Go home. God will help you," advised the rabbi.

"Thank you, thank you, Rabbi!" gushed the poor man gratefully. "I'm sure God will help me! But until He does, won't you be good enough to lend me five rubles?"

Mideast program faces real danger

Scene in Ottawa

By RICHARD CLEROUX

OTTAWA — Suddenly something that has worked so well for the cause of peace in the Middle East since 1992 seems to be in danger of coming apart.

Everyone knows about the bilateral one-to-one negotiations between Israel and her neighbors, Jordan, Lebanon and Syria, and the talks with the Palestinians, aimed at resolving conflicts of the past and producing bilateral peace treaties.

But out of the limelight, operating on a parallel track, there have been talks known as the Multilateral Negotiations going on between Israel, her Arab neighbors and representatives of about 40 nations and groups including the United States, the United Kingdom, Canada, Japan, Germany, the European Union, Russia, China, Norway, Turkey, the United Nations and the World Bank.

They have formed five working groups, each tackling a major regional problem — refugees, water, environment, arms control and economic development. The aim is nothing less than building a new Middle East, prosperous and cooperative, based on confidence between peoples and forgetting the past.

Canada is the chair of the Multilateral Working Group that deals with refugees, helping fund regional projects to feed, clothe, house and educate some of the 2.8 million Palestinian refugees.

The projects include paramedic training, dryland agriculture, public sector management training, community planning and a public health laboratory in the West Bank.

Sweden is spending $2 million on child welfare in Gaza and the West Bank, and the United States sponsors housing projects in Syria and Lebanon.

But now, after so much has been done, after wells have been dug, water mains laid, homes, schools and roads built, cottage industries created, self-help and awareness groups set up; after displaced rural people have been taught urban survival, Middle East style, there appears to be a hesitation, if not an unwillingness, on the part of some of the rich nations to continue the work.

Part of it may have to do with the election of a new government in Israel. The world is waiting to find out whether Benjamin Netanyahu's Likud government will continue along the same path to peace as the previous Israeli government, and whether he shares the same commitment to the Multilateral Working Groups.

"The Multicultural Working Groups are under review right now," says Canada's Foreign Affairs Minister Lloyd Axworthy. "They are not working out the way they should.

He's right. Some donor nations, including Western European countries that are quite friendly to Israel and are truly committed to peace in the Middle East, are having their own economic problems.

If they are going to continue spending money in the Middle East at the rate they have been, they want to make sure it is being spent for peace.

Axworthy says everything is on hold until the Arab summit meeting in Cairo this fall. It will define how the Arab nations plan to deal with the new Israeli government. In turn, this will give some indication of Arab commitment to the Multilateral Working Groups.

Without both Israel and its Arab neighbors firmly committed to the Multicultural Working Groups, there is not much point in continuing the costly exercise. Foreign aid can always be given strictly country to country, outside the framework of any multilateral structure.

Crown Prince Hassan of Jordan, brother of King Hussein and heir to the Jordanian throne, was in Ottawa June 17 for a meeting with Canadian officials.

He told Axworthy that Canada might do well to stop talking only about Palestinian refugees (mostly in Lebanon and in the territories) and pay a little more attention to the 140,000 refugees in Jordan. They need help just as much.

From a Jordanian perspective, the prince has a point.

As chair of the "multilateral" on refugees, it will be Canada's job to help sort out the redefinition that the prince envisions, as well as help interpret whatever stand the Netanyahu government takes on the issue in the coming months.

This review couldn't come at a worse time from a Canadian foreign aid perspective. The Canadian government is embarking on a massive cutback of its foreign affairs operations, affecting everything from its embassies, consulates, trade offices right down to every last dollar Canada spends abroad.

One of the areas under the knife may be the Multilateral Working Groups. It would be a shame, for Israel as well as for the cause of peace in the Middle East.

To build the new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders, we need $60,000,000.

Yes, that's what it costs to build the new home - a place of safety for the aging in our community.

Thanks to many donors we're on our way.

But we are only half way there and we need your help to reach $60,000,000.

Help us be there when you need us!

Reform campus groups making definite progress

By NATASHA GREENBERG

TORONTO — As a Reform Jewish student active in Jewish campus life, you often seem to be moving in a world sparsely populated by kindred spirits.

In general, a battle rages in Reform Jewish communities to halt the attrition of Jewish youth from involvement in Jewish religious and social life. Nowhere is this issue thrown into greater relief than on college campuses. Organized Reform sub-groups of the campus Jewish communities are only in the nascent stages on Canadian campuses, and are making slow, if definite, progress.

Reform Judaism's fourth annual college convention held by Kesher (the Reform Jewish student organization) and the Union of American Hebrew Congregations-Jewish Institute of Religion (HUC-JIRI) in Washington, D.C., this past March was, therefore, an opportunity for the record nine Canadian students who attended from Toronto, Hamilton and Montreal to hook into a larger Reform student community and to renew their enthusiasm for building Reform life on campus.

The conference drew students from across the United States, about 150 in all, from institutions as diverse as West Point Academy and Sarah Lawrence College. This variety provided a snapshot of the issues being faced on campuses across the continent, from the isolation of Reform students to marching by the Ku Klux Klan on campus.

The conference provided a forum for students to share their experiences and solutions to common problems and to offer support to those who had felt themselves to be fighting a solitary battle. There was also much time for celebration of Reform Judaism and of the common bond linking all those at the conference.

Daily services were well attended, great interest was shown in workshops on such topics as women in the Passover story, and songs of the Reform youth movement were sung with enthusiasm and fond remembrance.

The one major criticism expressed by most of the Canadians was the focus on issues relevant to the American college campus that largely excluded the Canadian students.

Friday was entitled Social Issue Exploration Day. The day on Capitol Hill offered speakers and workshops. Speakers included Senator Arlen Spector, who was slated to speak on Israel and the Peace Process: A View from the Hill. Instead, he preached to the converted, telling a group of university students to stay in school, as education is a valuable tool.

Dr. Delores C. Tucker, chair of the National Congress of Black Women, however, lit a firecracker under the group with her fire and brimstone invective against pornography and violence in rap lyrics. Again, while she was fascinating and made us all want to "put on our marching shoes," she presented the issue from a strictly American point of view.

Workshops dealt with issues such as welfare reform (of the American system), affirmative action and the (American) Jewish community and black-Jewish relations on the (American) campus. Despite the lip service given to the importance of drawing Canadian students into Kesher, no effort was made to include them or to deal with their issues, which was disappointing.

Other topics for the weekend included Kesher on campus — a nascent issue at best for Canadians, as Kesher does not yet exist on our campuses — and various topics relating to Israel.

Convention organizers brought in an array of HUC dignitaries to speak and to provide seeds of ideas and morsels of Reform Jewish insights into the issues under discussion.

For me and many others, I think, the true power of the weekend was derived from the peers with whom we shared it. The degree of involvement, talent and enthusiasm possessed by the attendees was truly inspiring, and in the chance to share and reaffirm that enthusiasm and commitment lay the true value of the weekend.

The greatest portent of hope for the future of Reform Judaism was the overwhelming number of students at the conference who hoped to enter the rabbinate or Jewish communal service. The surge of enthusiasm and talent that the Reform movement can look forward to is enormous.

Furthermore, all those set on more secular careers were just as intent on maintaining Judaism as part of their private and public lives. All participants perceived in Reform Judaism a set of guidelines for life, and all receive from their commitment to it satisfaction and joy. When these students are brought together, the sense of communal commitment renews each individual student's dedication to, and sense of hope for Reform activity on campus.

In the news brief Bonds Honors Morton, in last week's issue of The CJN, it stated that Harriet Morton would be honored on Aug. 7 at a champagne brunch. Morton's efforts will actually be recognized at a champagne evening reception.

Levy under fire for remarks about the Golan

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

HAIFA – The Golan Residents Committee sharply criticized Foreign Minister David Levy last Saturday for expressing willingness to reach a compromise with Syria on the Golan, in return for a peace accord between the two countries.

Levy, who made the comments in interviews on both television channels Friday night, said he did not rule out the possibility of the two sides meeting mid-way in the interests of peace.

"I believe that if peace serves both sides and they regard it as a primary interest, they will talk and meet halfway," Levy said, referring to Syria in an interview on Channel 2.

Asked about the possibility of a Golan compromise, he replied: "At a certain stage, and only if we achieve peace."

Levy said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government would have no choice but to dialogue with Arafat.

"He [Arafat] was elected [as Palestinian president]. There is a Palestinian Authority and we intend to advance toward peace and we will talk with him," he said.

Asked if he would be the first member of the government to shake Arafat's hand, Levy said, "I suppose so – if the other side carries out its commitments. We have no other partner."

Golan Residents Committee spokesperson Uri Heitner said Levy's comments were a "bad omen regarding the intentions of the new government.

"The Golan in its entirety is an integral part of the state. Any show of willingness to concede any part of it encourages Syrian aggressiveness and undermines Israel's policies," said Heitner.

"The prime minister, who received a mandate from the electorate to preserve the Golan, must immediately make it clear whether the comments of the foreign minister express the policies of the new government.

"We are not prepared to accept a continuation of policies that create uncertainty over the future of the Golan, as if it is some kind of merchandise.

Agriculture and Environment Minister Rafael Eitan disputed Levy's statements.

"I don't think we must compromise on the Golan Heights," he told Israel Radio. "The government has stated that the Golan Heights is vital to our interests and we will not go down from the Golan Heights."

Levy, however, did receive support for his comments from other residents of the Golan belonging to the Derech Le'Shalom movement.

Yigal Kipniss, the movement's founder and leader, said Levy had correctly identified the main problem in the peace process with Syria.

He said Levy's comments would help overcome Syrian concern regarding the seriousness of Israel's intention to hold real negotiations – on the basis of territory for peace.

Kipniss stressed that all Golan residents would applaud Netanyahu's negotiating prowess if he were able to implement his promises to achieve a peace-for-peace accord.

Syria said last Saturday that returning Arab lands was the only way to achieve peace with Israel and urged the Arab summit in Cairo to declare that Israel's rejection of the land-for-peace would be unacceptable.

Official Syrian media denounced calls by Netanyahu for peace talks with Arabs as baseless gestures which would only destroy the peace process.

"The new prime minister announced opposition to a Palestinian state or entity and threatened to renege on the few steps achieved on the way of peace," the official daily Tishreen said.

"The talks Netanyahu is demanding are futile, baseless, lead to no result and ruin the peace process because he denies the land-for-peace principle, backs off from commitments of the process ... So, after all this, what is left of the peace process?" Tishreen questioned.

Hebron redeployment planned

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – "The Netanyahu government will redeploy in Hebron," a senior security source said last week.

He said the civil government headquarters in the centre of the city, which to local residents symbolizes the occupation, will be vacated within several weeks.

At the same time, the IDF forces protecting Jewish settlers in the city will be reinforced.

Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai met with security officials last week to discuss redeployment in Hebron. He was to visit the city this week.

Meanwhile, Jewish residents of Hebron may be willing to accept a compromise whereby the city would become part of Area B (within the terms of the Oslo II accords), with the IDF having overriding security authority, but with the Palestinians having autonomy in other areas, including their own police force.

Attorney Elyakim Ha'etzni, who has traditionally been associated with the far right of the settlement movement, raised the compromise idea in an interview with Israel Radio.

The army, he said, must be in charge of security in the city, but at the same time, it does not particularly want the job of collecting Palestinian taxes or chasing Palestinian drug dealers. Therefore, he said, it would be possible to transfer civilian powers to the Palestinian Authority and to permit the Palestinians a lightly armed police force with which to carry out these powers.

If possible, however, this police force should be a local one, rather than one belonging to PA President Yasser Arafat, he said, not only because this would be preferable for the Jewish residents, but also because the city's Arab residents do not want Arafat in control.

"I have had innumerable conversations with Arabs who said they celebrated [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu's victory, because they hoped he would save them from Arafat," Ha'etzni told The Jerusalem Post. He said he has heard such sentiments even from members of Arafat's own Fatah faction.

Hebron spokesperson Noam Arnon did not reject Ha'etzni's idea. "Our opinion is a little different, but it's a matter of nuances," he said.

Sharon rejects cabinet offer

By SARAH HONIG
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

TEL AVIV – Likud MK Ariel Sharon said last week that he would not join the government if the Infrastructure Ministry to be created for him was "a make-believe" portfolio.

"I hope that the promises made to the public are kept better than the ones that were made to me," Sharon told Channel 1.

No progress was made on the Sharon matter over the weekend, and Likud insiders doubt the predictions coming from the camp of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu that the new portfolio will be all sewn up by the weekend.

Likud insiders say there is no way Netanyahu can force his coalition partners to yield significant chunks of their ministries in order to form Sharon's new super-portfolio. Significant contributions are necessary from the Agriculture, Transportation, Energy and Housing portfolios to create the new ministry, and none of the ministers in question is willing to make even minor concessions.

The most Netanyahu might be able to come up with, insiders say, is a few crumbs from the Prime Minister's Office, which are sure to fail to meet Sharon's expectations.

This was Sharon's first public pronouncement on the portfolio matter. He had remained silent ever since the government was formed and had kept to himself on his Negev ranch.

The very fact that Netanyahu had relegated the entire matter to Justice Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman does not bode well for Sharon's chances of eventually heading a new ministry, Likud insiders say.

Political expediency threatens pluralism

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Has religious pluralism in Israel, such as it is, been sacrificed on the altar of political expediency?

Mideast Analysis

This burning question looms large in the minds of non-Orthodox Israelis and Diaspora Jews now that Israel's Likud-centred government has been sworn in.

In the May 29 election, three religious parties — Shas, National Religious Party and United Torah Judaism — won an unprecedented number of Knesset seats (23) and thus increased their leverage over Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who could not rule without their parliamentary support.

In the ensuing bickering and manoeuvering that always accompanies the formation of a coalition in Israel, the religious parties demanded concessions that would increase their control over public and private life in the country and ensure generous access to state funds for their institutions and schools.

As Netanyahu and his aides considered their demands, Reform, Conservative and secular Jews expressed alarm that the principle of religious pluralism would be compromised.

These fears were best exemplified by Rabbi Eric Yoffie and Rabbi Philip Spectre, the respective leaders of the Reform movement in the United States and the Conservative movement in Israel. Both warned that the coalition agreements entered into by Netanyahu with the religious parties would effectively disenfranchise non-Orthodox Jews in Israel and create an atmosphere of coercion.

The first two sentences of the government's guidelines pertaining to religion and state are not menacing. "The government," it notes, "will act to bring the religious and secular closer through mutual understanding and respect. The government will retain the status quo on religious matters."

(The status quo is based on a letter David Ben-Gurion — the first Israeli prime minister — sent to two Orthodox rabbis in 1947. The status quo, regulating religious observance in Israel, granted the Orthodox branch of Judaism a monopoly over everyday matters such as marriages and burials.)

What troubles non-Orthodox Jews are the other clauses in the guidelines.

They would effectively close the door to non-Orthodox conversions and prevent Reform and Conservative Jews from sitting on religious councils. And they would shut stores and other establishments on the Sabbath, suspend archeological digs and ban the import of non-kosher meat.

Orthodox Jews claim that these edicts will strengthen Judaism and Israel's Jewish character. Non-Orthodox Jews counter that they will erode religious freedom and civil rights and cause a rift between Israel and the Diaspora.

At the heart of this controversy are two fundamental issues.

First, Orthodox Jews — constituting a minority of Israel's Jewish population but claiming to be the standard-bearers of authentic Judaism — want to preserve their hegemony over religion.

Second, they wish to roll back a recent series of Supreme Court decisions and Basic Laws passed by the Knesset, which have eroded that monopoly, and which they claim, impinge on religious practice and alter the status quo.

With four seats in the cabinet (especially education and interior), the religious parties are in a pivotal position to achieve their goals.

Among the Supreme Court verdicts the Orthodox hope to nullify are ones that mandate the inclusion of Reform and Conservative representatives on religious councils and those that implicitly recognize Reform conversions.

The Orthodox, too, are dissatisfied with the Ministry of Education's plan to develop curricula in public schools about Conservative and Reform Judaism.

No one should be surprised by the turn of events. Orthodox Jews have never been loath to articulate their aspirations and objectives, and in the runup to the election both Shimon Peres and Netanyahu scrambled for their votes.

Peres tried to woo the National Religious Party (NRP) to the fold, bewailing the loss of the "historic alliance" between the Labor party and the NRP. His tactic did not endear him to his coalition partner, the left-of-centre Meretz party.

For his part, Netanyahu — a secular Jew himself — bluntly told various delegations of non-Orthodox American rabbis and laypersons that Israel was not ready for religious pluralism at this point in its development.

Zalman Shoval, the Likud stalwart who is expected to regain his position as ambassador to the United States, promised the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations that there would be no change in the status quo.

But what is the meaning of the status quo today? The advances forged by non-Orthodox Jews through Supreme Court decisions of late? Or the preservation of the status quo as it existed before these verdicts were handed down?

We will see.

Israeli security forces dismissed the offer, saying that the leadership of the Hamas military wing abroad would still order attacks and create additional terrorist cells.

• Israel's outgoing air force commander, Herzl Bodinger, said chances of war breaking out in the near future are small, but the risks for Israel are high if war did break out. Bodinger said long-range missiles held by neighboring Arab nations could easily hit any target in Israel.

Arab states warn Israel

Last month's election of Netanyahu, leader of the right-wing Likud party, prompted Arab leaders to convene their first summit in six years to coordinate a united stand on the peace process with Israel.

While the summit brought together 21 Arab leaders who themselves have been divided on peace with Israel as well as other regional issues, they joined in the closing statement of warning to Israel.

Deviating from the land-for-peace principal, the statement said, would "lead to setbacks to the peace process, with all that implies in the way of dangers and repercussions which would take the region back to a cycle of tension."

The statement warned that a hard-line approach by the new Israeli government would be countered by a slowdown in the normalization of ties with Arab countries.

"The Arab states would be forced to reconsider the steps taken towards Israel in the framework of the peace process [and] the government of Israel alone would bear full responsibility."

The summit called on Israel to implement all elements of the peace agreements and to enable an independent Palestinian state to be established.

It also demanded an Israeli withdrawal from all occupied territories, including a withdrawal to the June 4, 1967 boundaries on the Golan Heights, the area Israel captured from Syria during the Six Day War.

Final draft toned down

The guidelines of the new Likud-led government explicitly oppose a Palestinian state and emphasize the national importance of the Golan Heights for Israel. At the same time, they call for negotiations with Syria with no set conditions.

Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak had negotiated hard with some participants, including Syrian President Hafez al-Assad, to tone down the final wording of the draft.

Mubarak said in a CNN interview that despite Netanyahu's public statements, he could prove to be more flexible in negotiations.

"It's too early to pass judgment now," he said. "I will wait until I meet with the Israeli leader, and hear his views."

Before the Arab summit, Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy sounded a conciliatory note, hinting in a weekend television interview that Israel could show some flexibility on the Golan.

His comments immediately drew a sharp response from leaders of the Golan residents, as well as The Third Way party, one of the government's coalition partners, which was elected on a platform opposing an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan.

A spokesperson for Netanyahu also issued a statement Sunday distancing the prime minister from Levy's remarks.

Only statements made by the prime minister reflect Israeli policy on these political issues, spokesperson Michael Stoltz reportedly said.

Levy himself later called the closing statement of the Arab summit "contradictory to the atmosphere necessary for continuing peace."

Netanyahu is scheduled to travel to Washington next month for talks with President Bill Clinton. He is also due to visit Jordan and Egypt in the coming weeks.

Jews involved in dialogue with Christians will wait and see how other Christian denominations will react, remarked Rabbi David Levy of Kitchener, Ont., who chairs Canadian Jewish Congress's interreligious affairs committee.

Another key indicator will be the response from those Christians "who have made peace with Jews," Rabbi Levy said.

Asked whether the Southern Baptists' move poses a danger to Canadian Jews, Rabbi Levy said, "it depends on how deep their pockets are. If they are, we may see a new enthusiasm for knocking on doors with mezuzot."

Frank Dimant, executive director of B'nai Brith Canada, said he finds the development "deplorable."

The SBC "is seeking to turn Jews away from their faith. They're ignoring tremendous strides made in dialogue and understanding," he said.

U.S. Jewish response has been mixed. The American Jewish Congress said it "is not exactly losing sleep" over the matter. "Here they go again," a statement said. "The convention is trying to do what some Christians have been trying to do without success for 2,000 years. They have a right to believe it. We have a right to disbelieve it."

But the American Jewish Committee is more concerned. The organization condemned the move "in the strongest possible terms" and expressed confidence that the SBC's campaign "will meet the same fate as all such efforts in the past — failure."

Warned Rabbi James Rudin, the committee's director of interreligious affairs, "It is now theological open hunting season on Jews."

Agudath Israel of America called the move "menacing" and decried "the targeting of Jewish souls as ripe for the snatching."

Several other U.S. Jewish groups, including those representing Conservative and Reform Judaism, expressed serious alarm at the new policy.

In Canada, there's plenty to worry about, Ciss said.

For one, the Fellowship of Evangelical Baptist Churches in Canada has set up, prior to this latest development, a task force on "Jewish evangelism" to "examine how we can encourage an effective witness to the Jewish community."

But the director of the 8,000-member Canadian Convention of Southern Baptists played down the matter.

The SBC resolution "doesn't carry any weight. It's not policy, only a statement," Al Schmidt told The CJN. "It's just an expression of somebody's opinion."

He said Canadian Southern Baptists, who are affiliated with the SBC, missionize to non-Christians but do not target any specific groups for conversion.

A spokesperson for the largest of Canada's five Baptist groups said the SBC's approach is "significantly different" from that of his organization.

David Phillips of the 130,000-member Canadian Baptist Ministries told The CJN his organization has enjoyed good relations with the Jewish community.

As for targeting Jews for conversion, "the word target has strong connotations. It's a military term. It does not represent how Canadian Baptists work. As far as sharing [the Gospels], we feel free to do that with anybody."

According to one report, the SBC, since 1857, has passed 10 resolutions proclaiming the need specifically to evangelize Jews.

Mall to proceed: builder

By ALISSA KAPLAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK – The saga of the ill-fated shopping complex across the road from the main entrance to Auschwitz continues.

In the latest development, the Polish developer of the area near the former Nazi death camp has said work would resume at the site unless the government made a decision to the contrary by the end of last week.

Earlier this month, Poland had ordered the police to stop the renewed construction of the controversial mini-mall, which was to house a supermarket, a home and garden centre and a fast-food restaurant, among other businesses.

The developer, Janusz Marszalek, this week indicated that he might build something other than a shopping complex.

Both Polish and Jewish officials – as well as other communities around the world – have denounced the mini-mall project. Many see the building of a shopping complex on the site as an offense to the memory of the victims of Auschwitz.

During World War II, nearly two million people were murdered, 90 percent of them Jews, at the Auschwitz-Birkenau death camp.

The latest developments prompted renewed concern.

If Marszalek builds, "I am sure the police will stop him," World Jewish Congress vice-president Kalman Sultanik said in an telephone interview from Israel.

Sultanik is scheduled to attend the July 7 and 8 meeting of the Auschwitz Museum Council, the body charged with protecting the integrity of the Auschwitz grounds.

The council, headed by former Polish foreign minister Wladyslaw Bartoszewski, who is an Auschwitz survivor himself, reportedly recommended recently that the guest facilities now on the museum grounds be moved to the site being developed.

Marszalek reportedly said the project had been modified to take this suggestion into account, but the details of his amended plans were unclear.

Argentina offers compensation for bomb attack on AMIA

By SERGIO KIERNAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES – The Argentine government will pay $12 million (US) to the country's Jewish community in reparation for the July 18, 1994, bombing of the Argentine Mutual Aid Association (AMIA).

News of the offer of payment divided the community, as some people wanted to reject the government's offer.

"That's blood money," said a Jewish community official who wished to remain anonymous.

"We cannot take money from a government we criticize for the handling of the investigation of the bombing," the official said. "Taking even a dime would soil us. Also, it could be perceived as a sort of reverse discrimination. People are hurting all over, and Jews get a special treatment."

Argentine President Carlos Menem signed a decree last week ordering that the money be paid to AMIA in 12 monthly installments, starting in January 1997.

According to the decree, $11 million is being given "toward the reconstruction of the AMIA building" and $1 million "for the creation of a museum of the Holocaust."

Jewish officials here and abroad have been critical of the Argentine government's inability to solve the case. Several suspects have been arrested and later released for lack of evidence.

Argentina has also come under criticism for a similar inability to find those responsible for the 1992 bombing of the Israeli Embassy here. That blast left 29 dead and some 100 wounded.

While some in the community want to turn down the government's offer, others say that an outright rejection of the payment would be insulting to the government.

Some in this camp have proposed that the community take the money and donate it to a non-Jewish hospital or charity.

Although the decree said the money should be used for the reconstruction of the AMIA building, community sources said the new, $5.5 million building is almost all paid for.

Peres will not resign

By MICHAL YUDELMAN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Former prime minister Shimon Peres said last week that he will not resign as head of the Labor party but will try to rehabilitate the party until its leadership primary, which he suggested holding in a year.

In his appearance before Labor's political bureau, which met to discuss the election results, Peres suggested setting up a shadow cabinet based on the British model, to provide an alternative to the government and be a fighting opposition.

In a soul-searching speech analyzing the election, Peres accepted responsibility, but noted that the Hamas and Islamic Jihad played a role in determining the election results.

He also admitted that he "was too influenced by the public opinion polls, which until almost the last day gave us a four to five percent advantage and dictated our behavior during the campaign. But on the last day there emerged previously unknown forces." (He was apparently referring to Chabad and the settlers.)

Peres revealed that his decision to advance the elections followed the realization that peace with Syria would not be achieved by the end of the year.

"Both the Americans and the Syrians said, let's finish the negotiations and reach an agreement by November, and I agreed to wait until then before holding the elections. I sent a message to Syrian President Hafez al-Assad and said, 'If you really want to do it, you must come to the negotiations yourself. Let me know that you're serious and will meet me every week if necessary until we reach an agreement.'" Peres said.

Assad agreed to meet him, but would not give a date, Peres said.

Peres said he was never one to run away from responsibility and will therefore stay at Labor's helm to pull the party together.

David Levy a no-show

TORONTO — Israeli foreign minister David Levy, scheduled keynote speaker for the Or Haemet Sephardic School dinner held on Monday at Le Parc Banquet Halls, changed his plans on short notice, arranging to speak by live phone hook-up instead of in person. He was unable to leave Israel due to the arrival of U.S. Secretary of State Warren Christopher early Tuesday morning.

Homeopathic medicine aims to help body heal itself

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The aim of health care should be to bring a person to the point where his or her body can heal itself, asserts pharmacist and nutritional therapist Ted Scharf.

"An aspirin may not be the only, or even the best, cure for a headache. Meditation, acupuncture or stress reduction may be just as effective."

Scharf, a graduate in pharmacy from the University of Toronto, became interested in complementary medicine in Israel.

"I prefer the term complementary medicine to alternative medicine. Traditional medicine has lots of good things to offer. You have to work with the best treatments that are available, wherever they come from.

"This is especially true with chronic disease, where medicine may have helped all it can, and is offering only palliative care."

Scharf believes that "disease is caused by an imbalance of some sort in the body. If you can correct that balance, the body can fight off disease by itself."

Good diet is essential, he said bluntly. "You can't be in good health with bad nutrition."

Dietary supplements, vitamins, minerals and homeopathic preparations give extra ammunition and strength to start the healing process, he explained.

While Canada's Food Guide is good for normal, healthy people, Scharf said, those with illnesses require different kinds of foods.

Cancer, for instance, "makes special demands on the body" and those with this disease require more unprocessed and green foods.

"The body needs all its strength to fight the cancer," he said. "If you don't have to spend all your energy digesting food from heavy meals, you can use it to fight the illness."

Also, he said, homeopathic supplements are available that can minimize side effects from chemotherapy. "And that's worthwhile in itself."

While Scharf believes firmly in the benefits of homeopathic medicine, he takes a scientific approach to its claims.

"I evaluate everything I read or hear about. Only when I have done research at the University of Toronto medical library do I consider incorporating it as part of a program."

He does not deal with acute illness, such as strep throat or severe pain, leaving that to the medical profession. Chronic, long-standing problems are his bailiwick, as are such concerns as weight control, asthma, allergies, acne and hypertension.

When clients come to Scharf for a consultation, they fill in a detailed series of questionnaires, which deal with medications, the course and extent of illnesses, symptoms, diet and eating and lifestyle patterns.

Treatment is prescribed on an individual basis, as every person, Scharf acknowledges, has his or her unique needs and characteristics.

Allergy sufferers can enjoy outdoors

TORONTO — The timing may vary from region to region, but one constant remains during the spring and summer. At some point, microscopic granules of pollen will descend upon allergy sufferers.

The end result is a breath of fresh air that is followed by sneezing, coughing, itchy and watery eyes and upper respiratory congestion.

The Lung Association is helping allergy sufferers learn how to manage their allergies and enjoy the outdoors in warm weather. Following is a list of measures allergy sufferers can take to make outdoor life "sneezeless."

Monitor air quality through radio, television and newspaper pollen count reports. Allergy symptoms often develop when pollen counts are moderate to high, but can continue even when the count lowers. Rainy, cloudy or windless days usually have lower pollen counts, but mould spores may be higher right after a rain. Taking note of which allergies are at the highest levels may help in determining those that are most bothersome.

Pollen levels are highest before 10 a.m.; so try not to be outdoors then. While indoors, close windows and use air conditioners to filter and dry the air. Have someone else mow the lawn or rake the leaves, because these activities stir up pollen and moulds.

Do not hang sheets or clothing out to dry. Pollen and moulds collect on these materials and can trigger allergies later.

Avoid touching eyes and nose and transferring pollen there.

Remember that alcohol stimulates mucus production and dilates the blood vessels, worsening runny nose and nasal congestion. Smoking irritates the eyes and respiratory system, making allergy symptoms worse.

Baseball slugger named NAIA all-American

Scott Perrin tears up U.S. college league

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Scott Perrin moved to Canada from England at age 8, soccer was his number 1 sport. He'd barely heard of baseball and thought the only sport in which you try to hit a ball with a stick was cricket.

Yet only a short while ago, the 21-year-old heavy-hitting right-hander was named to the 1996 All-America team of the NAIA, the small-college cousin of the NCAA.

He was also named conference player of the year for the NAIA's Keystone-Empire Collegiate Conference (KECC) and player of the year for the larger Northeast Section of the NAIA.

His sophomore season was one for the ages as Perrin hit .382 and broke Point Park College Pioneers' 16-year-old record for homers with 13 — a mark that was tough to eclipse because of the pitcher-friendly dimensions at the Pioneers' home field: 357 feet down the lines and 470 feet through straightaway centre.

Back in Toronto for the summer, he led the Inter-County Baseball League in batting after eight games with a .462 average, playing for Guelph.

Not bad for a guy born in South Africa who didn't play his first game of competitive baseball until he was 15.

Perrin, however, was a natural, making the Thornhill Reds rep team the first year he tried out. His strong arm and his ability to throw and catch were early assets and after a year at the plate, his hitting improved substantially.

From there, his baseball career kind of "snowballed," Perrin said. He was asked to play for High Park in the Metro AAA league (the city's best) and he was scouted by several U.S. colleges. He was offered some partial scholarships but chose Point Park College in Pittsburgh because it offered a full scholarship.

After his first year there, NCAA Division 1 schools came a-callin' and tried to lure him away with full-scholarship offers, but Perrin chose to stay.

His 1996 stats explain why he was such a hot commodity. In 49 games played, he came to the plate 170 times and knocked in 49 RBIs on 65 hits. His slugging percentage was an impressive .712.

The first-baseman was pretty effective in the infield as well, notching up only three errors all season.

"He's one of the best hitters I've ever had...He's still learning the game. In the past year, he was our most consistent hitters and never had a stretch where he wasn't contributing at the plate."

Schaly said Perrin "does everything." Not only can he hit for power, but his average is excellent as well. "He was the best hitter in the league by far."

Perrin, 5-foot-11, 190 lbs., said his biggest asset is his desire and dedication to hard work. "Going down there, the biggest adjustment was the discipline," he said. "Even though it's fun, it's a job.

> 'One of the best hitters I've ever had'

I received scholarship money and I worked for a [coach] whose job is to win games."

Perrin said when teammates were heading out for a cool, wet one after practice, he headed back to the gym to pump iron or to the batting cage to work on his swing.

"If you want something badly enough and you put in the hard work, you can play with those guys," he said of his U.S. counterparts.

Perrin's success in the U.S. college league and in the playoffs (he batted .500 in four playoff games before the top-ranked Pioneers were eliminated in the district finals) lead him to believe he's got a shot at the majors.

His coach thinks he could be drafted after his upcoming junior year and Perrin said he's now taking that possibility more seriously. He's spending a good part of his summer keeping himself in top shape, working on his flexibility, cardiovascular conditioning and strength.

And he's spending a lot of time in batting cages, getting ready for the chance that with a good year in '97, he'll be drafted by a major league team.

Israel names athletes for Olympic Games

CJN News services

JERUSALEM — Twenty-four Israeli athletes will go for the gold at the upcoming Olympic Games in Atlanta.

Israel's Olympic commission recently presented the team, which includes 13 coaches.

The team consists of Yael Arad and Oren Smadja (judo); Gocha Chichiashvili (wrestling); Nir and Ran Chantal, Shani Kedmi, Anat Frabrikant and Gal Friedman (sailing); Rogel Nahum, Constantin Matusevich, Constantin Simyonev and Danny Krasnov (track and field); Vacislav Ivanovsky (weightlifting); Boris Polak, Alex Tripolski, Guy Starek (shooting); Lydia Hatoel-Zuckerman, Ayelet Ohayon, Lilach Parisky (fencing); Vacislav Neiman (boxing); Yoav Bruck, Vadim Alexsev, Dan Kutler and Eytan Orbach (swimming).

Israel's Olympic flag will be carried by Barcelona silver medalist Arad at the games' opening ceremonies on July 19.

The director of the Elite Sport Unit, Itzik Ben-Melech, was wary about Israel's success on the medal podium. "No one on the team is the best in the world, but we have athletes like Oren and Gocha who are among the best in their field. If we have five or six athletes in the finals, it will be considered a success."

Canadian soccer star honored by YMHA

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — For the second year in a row, up-and-coming Canadian soccer star Colin Berenhaut has been named winner of the Max M. Nusgart Memorial Award.

Last year, Berenhaut was the co-winner along with tennis player Hart Pollock. The award is presented yearly to the Manitoba Jewish Athlete of the Year at the annual YMHA Jewish Community Centre's Winnipeg Sports Dinner.

Last summer, Berenhaut was invited to play goal for the Canadian Under 17 national team, as well as for the Under 19 National Academy team based in Hamilton. Last August, he joined the Manitoba all-star team for the fourth consecutive year for the national Under 17 championships.

Last winter, he was named starting goalkeeper for the national Under 20 team. At a World Cup qualifying tournament in Monterey, Mexico, Berenhaut recorded two shutouts and led Canada to victory and a shot at the Under 20 world championship title. He is currently considering scholarship offers from several American universities.

The other finalists for the Nusgart Award were Marty Halparin, a 44-year-old jeweller who competes in Iron Man triathlons; Rebecca Hoffer, a University of Manitoba physical education student and member of Canada's National Women's Handball team, which is stationed in Montreal; teenager Olia Berger, a judo gold medal winner several times over; and 9-year-old rhythmic gymnast Mira Lecker, who competes nationally.

This year marked the 24th annual YMHA Sports Dinner open to the public. Funds raised go toward the Y's day camps, seniors programs and special needs programs.

Dinner chair Ken Kronson said 900 people came to hear featured speakers former hockey star Dennis Hull, and author and former major league baseball pitcher Jim Bouton. Awards are also given out at the dinner to winning teams in Winnipeg Jewish racquetball, baseball, hockey and floor hockey leagues.

Mizrachi concert pays tribute to 'Uncle Max'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — This year's Mizrachi annual concert had a bittersweet quality to it, as it was dedicated to the memory of Max Zeifman, who died earlier this year.

Zeifman, known affectionately as "Uncle Max," was active in Mizrachi for a number of years. The concert was a special favorite of his, said Mizrachi national executive vice-president Rabbi Menachem Gopin.

"Before he died, he chose the artists, and was very involved in the beginning of solicitations. There would be no greater joy for Max than to be remembered not through sadness but through [the happiness of this concert]."

Ben Zion Miller, former cantor of Shaarei Tefillah Congregation, and now chazzan of Congregation Beth-El in Boro Park, the featured performer, dedicated one of his selections, Leibele Glanz's Sh'ma Yisroel, to Zeifman's memory, saying he had always asked for that particular piece.

"I hope he hears me," Miller said, looking at the front-row seat left empty in Zeifman's honor.

He dedicated another piece, V'Searev, in honor of the Jerusalem 3000 celebrations. While one might have expected a more popular musical tribute to the city, nevertheless it was well-received by the audience of over 600.

Miller chose a well-rounded selection of pieces, from liturgical, including Machtenberg's Shehecheyanu, which begins slowly, almost sombrely, and segues into a lively, foot-stomping beat, and a beautiful rendition of David Koussevitzky's V'Chol Hachayim, to folk to Yiddish.

Especially effective were his interpretations of Pinchik's Der Chazzan un der Gabbai, a mock musical argument between an upstart synagogue officer and a self-confident cantor, and the charming Far Vos Zingt a Chazzan, by Sholom Secunda.

It is always fascinating to be able to see a singer's voice mature from the almost tentative and straining efforts of a very young man, to the self-assured and polished production of the accomplished performer.

But the hit of the evening was the performance of 11-year-old Dani, a child soloist in the Tzlil Vazemer Boys Choir and on several tapes. While he seemed a little uncomfortable in his first set, which included a bouncy L'Cho Dodi and a haunting rendition of Dveykus' Achainu, by his second appearance, he had found his feet, and produced an incredibly moving Ani Ma'amin and an enthusiastic Hu Klal Gadol by Yisroel Williger that had the audience clapping and stamping their feet.

Miller, who earlier in the evening somewhat ruefully recalled the show-business adage "never follow a kid or a monkey," nevertheless joined Dani in an encore, a lively version of Nar Haisi, which Rabbi Gopin dedicated to Israeli Prime Minister-elect Benjamin Netanyahu.

The Cudyk Weinberg Scholarships, which assist the recipients to study in Israel, were presented to Caroline Biton of Ulpanot Orot and Arie Feldman of Or Chaim, who is one of this year's Mizrachi political science interns.

Frenkel Gets Nod To Stay

JERUSALEM — Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu formally asked Bank of Israel Governor Jacob Frenkel yesterday to stay in his post for a second, five-year term, and to head a new council of economic experts which will work alongside the cabinet, aides to the two men said.

Meanwhile Netanyahu cancelled his intention to transfer the budget department from the Treasury to the Prime Minister's Office, a move which would have deprived the ministry of its main source of power.

Don't take what Vera Held says personally

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Too many times, we walk away from a conversation with an acquaintance, associate or co-worker feeling hurt. Have we taken it the wrong way or over-reacted?

"People often feel that others are being insensitive, when in reality they may have misinterpreted what was actually said," says Vera Held, a Toronto communication coach, speaker and writer.

In business and in everyday life, miscommunication and misinterpretation can lead people to take comments and actions personally, Held says. "This can lead to a loss of productivity or breakdown in constructive team efforts and stunt creativity, resulting in missed opportunities and rifts between co-workers, friends, acquaintances and family that can last for years."

In an attempt to help people avoid this, Held, 38, has written How Not to Take it Personally (McGraw-Hill Ryerson), a book full of strategies for communication success in all aspects of life.

First of all, people have to learn how to listen, she says. "People may hear well but that does not mean they are listening. The number I communications myth is that listening comes naturally. Unlike breathing, however, listening is a mental process. You must first make a decision to listen, then use your good listening habits to do so. When we are tired, it is difficult to listen well."

Vera Held

Communication, says Held, is the giving and getting of information and it is constant, whether or not there is feedback. "Sometimes people do not ask for feedback and then they are hurt and disappointed because their expectations are not met. They need to discover if their expectations were realistic in the first place.

"Get to know the people you are having problems with and discover how they operate. Maybe you can reach a midway point and find some solidarity. Maybe it is just a matter of changing speaking styles in order to get along. In understanding speaking styles it is important to realize that each style has characteristics that some will view as either positive or negative. None of these styles are better or worse, they're just different."

She says that as well as speaking style, people's personalities differ and especially when dealing with challenging personalities such as manipulators, so-called experts, or complainers everyone needs to be prepared. Among the 10 ways Held cites to prepare for dealing with a challenging personality are to affirm that "I am in control of how I think and feel. Others can only hurt or disappoint me if I let them. I am responsible for my own self-worth and I do not need anyone else's approval but my own."

Survivors' memoirs recorded for posterity

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Howard Cooper wants to help Holocaust survivors record their stories for future generations of their families.

Using desktop publishing, he turns his clients' memoirs into books for personal use, but his ghost writing services are not limited to Holocaust survivors. He has written books based on other kinds of personal histories, he says.

It's important for children to know their roots and be familiar with the histories of grandparents and great-grandparents, he says.

"I didn't know much about my own family. I know nothing about my paternal great grandfather. Nobody ever talked about him. His history is lost forever."

He keeps his rates reasonable, especially for Holocaust survivors, he says, because he is interested in pleasing his clients. "It's not my intention to get wealthy writing Holocaust memoirs," he says.

The stories generally run about 80 pages, but he has just completed a 250-page manuscript which is slated to be translated and published in Spanish.

Cooper tapes interviews with his clients and organizes the information into a written document. He can add pictures and other graphics to make the books as readable and informative as possible.

Howard Cooper

A teacher with an MA in psychology, Cooper began his writing career in the '70s preparing documentary dramas, an experience he says taught him to tell other people's stories.

In addition to family histories, he does research and prepares articles and books for psychiatrists and psychologists. He also teaches OAC English at a local high school in the evenings.

Cooper has so far completed six books since he began recording family histories three years ago.

Eye on Arts

by Bill Gladstone

SHOWBIZ MISHMASH

Yiddishland Returns: In case you missed it, the premiere of the Yiddishland Cafe last month, in the Workmen's Circle Building at 471 Lawrence Ave. W. near Bathurst, was an astonishing evening of entertainment, a Yiddish variety show par supreme featuring many very talented performers. One really didn't need to farshtey Yiddish in order to enjoy it.

Alas, I was obliged to leave early due to a prearranged visit with a sick friend – and not because the inimitable Stella Walker took off her purple feather boa in mid-song and wrapped it comically around my head. (Fortunately I'm not allergic to feather boas, though it did prove a trifle warm.)

The next Yiddishland Cafe occurs at Workmen's Circle Sunday July 7, 8 p.m.The program features The Golden Peacock, Itsik Manger, in an evening of song, poetry and music. Also Batsheva, Chaya Thalenberg, Shasha Luminsky and Martin Van de Ven.

Adults $10 in advance, $12 at the door. Tickets available at Lasting Impressions One Hour Photo, Bathurst Manor Plaza, or by phone at 416-783-5919 or 416-633-4212. Doors open 7.30 p.m.

New Programs Coming: Word comes to us from David Buchbinder, artistic director of the Ashkenaz festival, that planning is currently under way for a wide range of courses and events "to give us an ongoing presence in the community, and to help to bring our vision of participatory Yiddish culture to the community."

According to Buchbinder, all activities will occur at the Bloor Street JCC. Topics will include klezmer music, singing, theatre, dance as well as "thumbnail" courses in basic Yiddish. As well, special programs are being developed for the holidays of Chanukah, Purim and Passover.

Billed as a celebration of new Yiddish culture, the Ashkenaz festival attracted as many as 30,000 people to Toronto's Harbourfront over a six- day period last August. The next Ashkenaz is scheduled for next summer.

Buchbinder, incidentally, is leader of the nine-year-old and very hot Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, which has just finished recording a live CD, the band's third. The recording features guest artist Adrienne Cooper, a Yiddish singer from New York. It is slated for release in the fall.

Canadian Oddity: Hillel Tryster, deputy director and researcher of the Steven Spielberg Jewish Film Archive in Jerusalem, informs us of a short 16mm filmclip that should interest students of Canadian-Jewish history. The item, which may have been part of a newsreel made about 1930, was screened last year at an Italian film festival whose program described it as follows:

"An amusing little oddity which, apart from its ethnographic interest, could stand as the ultimate statement of Jewish assimilation in the diaspora. Brother Charles C. Hershon of the Knights of Pythias in Quebec is invested as 'Chief Great Heart' by Caughnawauga Indians in recognition of his charitable work among them."

Wonder if the Pythian knight was any relation to Canadian Jewish Congress president Goldie Hershon?

Piano Musketeers: Upbeat easy listening, jazzy and gothic and even funny, is featured on this CD of 21 instrumental pieces performed by the young students of Thornhill music teacher Fishel Pustilnik. Selections include the Love Story Theme, Flight of the Bumblebee, Bei Mir Bist Du Shein and Michelle.

Pustilnik produced and arranged this eclectic assortment of hits, but top billing must go to his troupe of musicians, who range in age from about 9 to 15. They are: Mary Preisman, Brett Kruger, Sarah Median, Jonatan Ashurov, Yoni Samuel, Iris Sepiashvili, Lea Epstein, Doron Cohen, Barbara Yermak, Laura Leong, Steven Preisman, Alan Bekerman, Jenny Sepiashvili, Johnny Sepiashvili and Gennady Liakhter.

Piano Musketeers would make a great inspirational gift for young music students. To order, phone 905-882-1233 or write to F. Pustilnik, 162 Pinewood Dr., Thornhill Ont. L4J 5P5.

In Brief: Featuring the brilliant collaboration of four theatrical legends –director/choreographer Jerome Robbins, librettist Arthur Laurents, composer Leonard Bernstein and lyricist Stephen Sondheim – a new production of West Side Story coming soon to Toronto promises fidelity to the 1957 original. At the O'Keefe Centre, July 9 to 14. 416-872-2262.

• Toronto-born pianist Arthur Gold (1917-1990), who was part of the celebrated piano duo Gold and Fizdale, was remembered along with his partner Robert Fizdale, at a memorial service this month at the Lincoln Centre, New York. Gold is survived by three sisters, Lillian Messinger, Dorothy Kohen and Susan Smith of Toronto.

• Author Cynthia Ozick has turned her 1989 novella The Shawl into a play. Directed by Sidney Lumet, it opened last week for a limited run at the Jewish Repertory Theatre, an off-Broadway playhouse.

• Our best wishes and congratulations go to Billy Wilder, the legendary Hollywood director, who turns 90 this month.

Jewish community must stress identity first: report

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Greater Vancouver Jews should spend more energy in building Jewish identity than on constructing new buildings, says Jim Torczyner, a Montreal professor of social work, in a report commissioned by the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver.

The report notes that the city's 25,000 Jews have the highest rate of intermarriage and highest proportion of non-religious Jews in Canada. It adds that almost half the children in Greater Vancouver live in families where one parent is not Jewish. About 26 percent of Jews are married to non-Jews, compared to a national average of 15 percent.

Nevertheless, says Torczyner, Greater Vancouver may be a prototype of new, emerging Jewish communities which are more diverse and tolerant than the larger, older communities in Toronto and Montreal.

To strengthen Jewish identity, the report suggests a closer linkup with the 40,000-person "intensely religious" community in nearby Seattle and with the 40,000 Jews in Portland, Ore., just south of Seattle.

The Jewish identity problem here is also exacerbated by the fact that 40 percent of Vancouver's Jews live out of the city in suburbs like Richmond, North Vancouver and Burnaby. Suburban Jews tend to be younger, Canadian-born and less likely to be religious, says the report.

Greater Vancouver Jews are better off economically, says the report, than Canadian Jews as a whole, and all Canadians. Almost three times as many Greater Vancouver Jews earned $75,000 or more than the general population.

However, the study found that one out of six Jews, mainly female or elderly, live in poverty — a rate higher than national Jewish poverty levels but lower than the national average.

Genealogist wants Shoah victims remembered by their names

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Although the Nazis took away their names and gave them tattooed numbers, the victims of the Holocaust "deserve to be remembered by their names," genealogist and author Arthur Kurzweil told an audience here recently.

"I want to take away their numbers and give them back their names; that's the least we can do," said Kurzweil, as he recounted how he discovered the names of more than 100 murdered cousins through a variety of genealogical sources including interviews with relatives, government documents, pre-war Polish telephone books and a missing persons bureau established by the International Red Cross in 1943.

When he first began to explore his family tree more than 20 years ago, people told him he was engaged in an impossible task, since many Jewish names were changed, records destroyed and towns wiped off the map, Kurzweil said. Despite this discouraging advice, he subsequently traced an ancestral line on his father's side back to Poland in the mid-1700s, and on his mother's side to about 1500.

Kurzweil's 1980 book, From Generation to Generation: How to Trace Your Jewish Genealogy and Family History, has become a classic guidebook to Jewish genealogy, outlining the most common sources and dispelling the prevailing myth that most Jews would get nowhere attempting to trace their roots.

Speaking at a Shabbaton at the Bloor JCC, the New Jersey-based author said genealogy is more than a hobby or fad. Rather, he said, it is a fundamental way for Jews to bridge the tragic discontinuity of recent history and to recognize the unity of the Jewish people from the time of Sinai to the present.

Tracing his family's history has been important for him not only as a Jew but also as an American, Kurzweil said.

"This is my Mayflower," he said, holding up a large passenger list showing the arrival of the ship Fatherland, which brought his grandmother to the port of New York in 1901. His discovery that his grandmother arrived at the age of 15 with only $15 in her pocket transformed his impression of her "from a grumpy old woman into a hero who saved my life," he said.

The first step of the genealogist is to find and interview relatives, starting with the eldest, he said. Talking to the people who can tell you about your family is more important than any document you might find in any archives or institution.

"Sometimes, just one word from a relative can open up a whole new world."

Acknowledging that most of his listeners weren't about to start researching their family trees after hearing him speak, Kurzweil urged them nonetheless to organize their old family photographs and label them with names, dates and places, whenever possible. Old photographs for which information is no longer available should be carefully preserved, he said.

Judaica shop has lots of mazel

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — In 1966, Miriam and William Rosenthal drove past an empty store at the corner of Bathurst and Caribou and decided it was a perfect location for a Judaica shop.

Now celebrating their 30th year in business, the Rosenthals look back to that lucky day and the opening of Miriam's Fine Judaica, which they operate with their daughter Lillian.

The Rosenthals had just arrived in Toronto. After the war, the couple, both Holocaust survivors, went to Cuba, Paris, New York, Timmins and Sudbury before moving to Toronto.

They lived in Sudbury for 16 years. William was a cheder teacher and spiritual leader for the 120 Jewish families there, while Miriam organized the synagogue auxiliary and was active in Hadassah.

"We've had lots of good mazel," says Miriam. "We have customers from across Canada and from out of the country. Many of the students my husband taught in Sudbury and Timmins come to visit the store and they buy items for their own children's bar or bat mitzvah. And sometimes they just drop in to reminisce about the good old days."

A lot of changes have taken place since they opened the store, she says. "In the early days, the merchandise included many green patina items from Israel and jewelry with Eilat stones. Over the years, the range of Judaica has grown to include exquisitely crafted items from Israel — glass, silver, ceramics and silks in contemporary and traditional designs by well-known artists."

About Life

Dear Ella,

All my life I've tried to do the right thing. I have always tried my best to treat women with the respect and admiration they deserve. If it wasn't for woman, man would live his life uneventfully and alone.

My problem comes when I want to further my relationship with a woman, meaning more than being just friends. The biggest and most common excuse they tell me is "You're a nice guy but..." I wish that just once they would say yes and find out how romantic, attentive and passionate I can be.

So my question to you is: Where are these nice women who know what they want in life and are looking for a real nice guy (who is not bad looking)? Or is it worth it to mutate into one of these aggressive womanizing, unsympathetic, neanderthals, who all women seem to adore and flock to?

Nice Lonely Guy

Dear Nice Lonely Guy,

It sounds to me like you are looking for love in all the wrong places. I have a feeling that you are setting your sights on women who are not at all suited to you.

Sometimes, you might see or meet someone whom you think you're attracted to, but that does not automatically mean that they will reciprocate your feelings. As a matter of fact, they may not even be looking for a relationship.

Don't be too impatient and don't set your sights on the type of woman who as you say, prefers the company of "neanderthals."

Look and talk to couples who end up together and you'll see that they usually match (more or less), not only in appearance, but intellectually and with similar values as well.

My guess is, that if you are pursuing a woman who would rather be with a womanizing neanderthal, that woman would not be suited to you anyway.

Re-evaluate the women you are attracted to and try to set some realistic goals. Most of all remember, there is someone out there for you. Someone with the same values, someone who would like nothing more than to meet a special man who will treat her with respect and admiration. Relax and give yourself a chance. Don't let someone's outer appearance cloud your vision from seeing the beauty that may lay within.

Israel urges battle against terror

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has called for international pressure to be put on states that sponsor terrorist organizations.

"We must continue the battle against terrorism and the countries behind them," Netanyahu said last Thursday. "Anyone who wants to be a partner to peace and considers himself part of it must take part in the struggle against terrorists and must put political and economic pressure on those countries which give them shelter and support."

Condemnation of terror, he said, "is not only in words, but in deeds."

Netanyahu's remarks at the graduation ceremony for a pilots' course appeared to be directed at Syria, implying that the United States and other countries should exert pressure on Damascus to end its support of terrorist groups.

He spoke the day after a terrorist attack in Saudi Arabia left at least 19 Americans dead, and an ambush in the Jordan Valley took the lives of three Israeli soldiers.

A group calling itself the Fatah-Intifada, believed to be based in Syria, claimed responsibility for the attack on the Israelis, Israel Radio reported.

Other reports said the attack was carried out by members of the Palestine National Liberation Organization, also based in Damascus.

After the attack, Netanyahu accused Syria of becoming a base for Middle East terror – remarks that drew sharp reaction from Damascus.

The daily Tishreen wrote that Netanyahu was "violating the basis of peace" by continuing a policy of Jewish settlements, ignoring American principles of land-for-peace and continuing the occupation of Arab land.

Meanwhile, a senior Palestinian official, Farouk Kaddoumi, on Thursday called on the United States to pressure Israel to accept the land-for-peace principle.

Kaddoumi, who is regarded as Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat's foreign minister, has long opposed the Israeli-Palestinian peace accords and, unlike other senior Palestine Liberation Organization officials, has not come to the self-rule areas.

Kaddoumi said statements by American mediators have proved that they are not impartial in the negotiations.

Entebbe: a personal reflection

By TAMARA ELAGIN
Special to the CJN

Feature

June 27 is a day on which I reflect each year and commemorate the incredible events I experienced exactly 20 years ago.

I had just spent eight months in Israel on a combined kibbutz/working holiday. My mother was also in Israel for part of that time, visiting her sister who lives in Petach Tikvah. We decided to return to Canada together by way of Paris.

We boarded Air France Flight 139 at Ben-Gurion Airport on a Sunday. I was not aware of, nor was I told about, the brief stopover in Athens to pick up additional passengers. Little did we know what sort of passengers!

I remember quite vividly the ascent from Athens, the No Smoking sign going off and then hearing a scream.

Two men and a woman suddenly appeared at the divider between the first class and economy sections and the European-looking man (who I later learned was German) announced over the speaker that they were part of the Che Guevara Group of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine and the aircraft was now under their command. One of his Arab cohorts held up a hand grenade for added effect. The message was clear – we were being hijacked!

And so our ordeal began. I remember being struck by the irony that I had just come through eight months in Israel untouched by terrorism and now, upon leaving the country, I was confronted with this.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Peanut Free Policy

TORONTO – Associated Hebrew Schools has instituted a new peanut/nut/peanut butter free policy.

Responding to the increasing number of children with these types of allergies, the principals and supervisors of Associated recommended the new policy, developed in concert with parents of allergic children. No date has been set for implementation.

AJC Outreach

HALIFAX – As part of the Atlantic Jewish Council's outreach program to maintain Jewish continuity in Atlantic Canada, Rabbi Shlomo Grafstein of Halifax has been sent to the Jewish community of Prince Edward Island to teach midrash and Jewish songs.

ISRAEL

Leaders Meeting

JERUSALEM – Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat will likely meet "within a month," because there is no choice if the peace process is to get back on track, Faisal Husseini, the senior Palestinian official in Jerusalem, said last week.

Jewish Agency Assembly

JERUSALEM – The annual assembly of the Jewish Agency for Israel opened last week amid an atmosphere of fiscal crisis that some believe reflects a crossroads in Israel-Diaspora relations.

Others see the crisis as a sign that the agency, whose historical role has been Jewish rescue and resettlement, must redefine its mission.

Peace Negotiator

JERUSALEM – Former president Chaim Herzog may be asked to chair the stalled Northern Ireland peace talks, according to unofficial sources in London.

Belfast-born and raised in Dublin, Herzog is in the rare position that he has not only gained substantial diplomatic and political experience during his years at the United Nations and as Israeli president, but also has close family ties with Ireland without being either Protestant or Catholic.

Mosque In Knesset

JERUSALEM – A mosque will be opened in Israel's Parliament after a Muslim legislator requested the prayer area.

Abul Maik Dehamshe, a leader of the country's Islamic Movement and new Knesset member, said he believed that it was important that Muslim members have a place to pray.

The Knesset has long had a synagogue for its Jewish members. Muslim legislators have never before requested their own prayer room.

More Jerusalem Housing

JERUSALEM – Israel's deputy housing minister has promised to push for more building in Jerusalem, including the construction of a controversial housing project bordering the Palestinian autonomous areas.

El Al Flies To Jordan

JERUSALEM – As Arab leaders at the summit in Cairo discussed their relationship with Israel, the Jewish state and Jordan continued to tighten their ties.

On board the 25-minute flight that took off from Tel Aviv was Israeli Transportation Minister Yitzhak Levy.

WORLD

Citizenship Revoked

NEW YORK – A federal court has revoked a man's U.S. citizenship because of his service in the Nazi-sponsored Lithuanian security police during World War II.

Kazys Gimzauskas, 88, went back to Lithuania more than two years ago while he was under investigation by the Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations. He had been living in St. Petersburg, Fla.

German Diplomat To Israel

BONN – The vice-director of the German Foreign Ministry, Theodor Wallau, has been named as the new German ambassador to Israel.

The 59-year-old career diplomat will replace Franz Bertele, who is retiring after a two-year term in Israel.

Yiddish Daily To Close

PARIS – Unzer Wort (Our Word), the last Yiddish daily newspaper in the world, is closing down at the end of the month, a half-century after it was founded.

The decision to cease publication resulted from the newspaper's inability to meet rising production costs at a time when readership has continued to decline.

EU Peace Stance

FLORENCE – The European Union has called on Israel and its Arab neighbors to resume peace negotiations on a variety of issues, including the future of Jerusalem.

Polish Ceremony

ROME – Anti-Semitic overtones emerged at a ceremony last week in Warsaw commemorating the 20th anniversary of worker protests in 1976 that sowed the seeds for the solidarity trade union movement four years later.

Rabinovich Resigns As Ambassador To U.S.

JERUSALEM – Ambassador to Washington and negotiator with Syria Itamar Rabinovich resigned last week.

Rabinovich reportedly said he could not defend the new government's position on retaining sovereignty over the Golan Heights as an outcome of peace settlement with Syria.

While it was clear that Rabinovich, who was appointed by Yitzhak Rabin to both positions in 1992, would resign after Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's victory, the move was only announced after he met with the premier.

Netanyahu lauded Rabinovich's contribution to Israel, and he agreed to stay in his post until Sept. 1.

Bonds leader expects investments to continue

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The worldwide head of the Israel Bonds organization does not expect any let up in investments in Israel as a result of the change of government.

Maj.-Gen. Nathan Sharony, who was in Vancouver recently to attend a tribute dinner for the Morris Wosk family told The CJN in an interview that it is wrong to assume Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will head up a hard-line government.

Netanyahu will continue negotiations started by the previous government but his methodology may change, and priority will be given to security in order to create stability, Sharony said.

That is what Netanyahu will bring to the negotiating table "in a way he believes can best be brought about."

Sharony said the desire for peace

Nathan Sharony

is strong and he doesn't see Netanyahu wavering.

The prime minister "talks of things that can be achieved. He will gain peace in Gaza and the West Bank, but in his own way, which may be faster or slower. But he won't compromise security to get a nice flavor in the international market. Opening of the world market will be a byproduct of his commitment to peace."

Sharony is president of the Development Corp. of Israel, an umbrella company for Bonds registered in the United States. Affiliated Bonds organizations in other countries operate in accordance with their own securities regulations.

Israel Bonds will continue to sell, Sharony says, because the organization is apolitical and has operated successfully under Labor and Likud governments since it was set up in 1951 to raise funds for Israel's growth.

Asked why Israel still needs to sell Bonds when the financial strength of the country is reported to be growing, Sharony said the very growth of the country requires added financing — just like a growing business.

Israel raises money through four avenues, he said. The state issues its own guarantee on debt to the extent of $1.5 billion per year; Israel Bonds provide close to $1 billion, the second largest source of funds; "Yankee Bonds" to the tune of about $250 million are guaranteed by the United States; and about $400 million is obtained through syndication via banks worldwide.

With the economy growing at a brisk six percent a year, hard currency working capital is needed to pay for such things as the imported heavy machines and material Israel requires to produce exportable goods. A railway network is also in the planning.

Sharony attributes the economy's growth to the heavy immigration of educated Jews from former Soviet Union and to the peace process, in more and more countries have recognized the advantages of investment in Israel.

Keeping up with interest rates is difficult, he said, especially in the United States. Because of the financial world's credit rating system, Israel must pay a premium of 70 basis points above U.S. rates, and this is reviewed every 45 days, going up or down, depending on market conditions.

The United States has a secondary market for securities, which can change interest rates almost daily, and as Israel does not have a secondary market, the 45-day changes can often be drastic. So there can be no guarantee of a fixed income.

Israel's involvement in the business world is, therefore, highly specialized and has to be watched closely. A stable peace situation is needed and Sharony thinks Netanyahu's policies can achieve this.

Sharony was born in 1934 in Petah Tikvah, served 30 years in the army and then was in private industry before taking on the Bonds presidency. He lives in Tel Aviv.

Sephardic Rabbinate launched

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Rabbi Amram Assayag wants to make one thing clear. As chief rabbi of the recently formed Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario, he wants it known that the new Sephardi umbrella organization does not indicate a splintering off from the rest of the Jewish community.

On the contrary, the new Sephardi group was formed with the support of Toronto's Vaad Harabanim, of which Rabbi Assayag is a past president and on which he still remains active as a dayan (judge) of its rabbinical court.

"We support and see the need for this type of cohesiveness," Rabbi Moshe Stern, president of the Vaad, said about the new Sephardi umbrella.

The Sephardi community in Toronto dates back to the 1950s, when Moroccan immigrants first arrived in significant numbers. Today the community — which also includes Jews of Iraqui, Turkish and Yemenite origin, among others — has grown to almost 8,000 people and half a dozen congregations, the largest of which is Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla with 350 member families, where Rabbi Assayag serves as spiritual leader.

"Originally there was one shul and everyone was together," said Rabbi Assayag in a recent interview. "[Now there are] different synagogues in different areas of the city. We saw the community being divided in small groups. Even the small groups felt they wanted to belong to something stronger."

In fact, Sephardi rabbis did belong — and still do belong — to the Vaad Harabanim, Toronto's umbrella group for Orthodox rabbis.

"We are very proud that in our community all the Sephardi rabbis that are rabbis of congregations are part of the Vaad Harabanim. We all work together and we're all friends," said Rabbi Stern.

Toronto is unique in that respect, Rabbi Stern believes. "Even within the Orthodox movement in other [Diaspora] cities, there is often fragmentation. We are all one group. We have all the Orthodox rabbinic components — the yeshivah world, the synagogue world, the Sephardic world. [In some other cities] the Sephardi community has its own kashrut supervision and so on."

Paratrooper's journal touches the heart

No grief can be greater than that of a parent over the loss of a child. And yet that inexpressibly bitter sorrow has been suffered by the parents of Israel, the people and the nation, in mournful thousands.

The bullet which, out of the terrible darkness in the rocky hills of south Lebanon on Sept. 15, 1987, ended the life of their 25-year-old son, Alex, brought that sorrow into the lives of Suzanne and Max Singer of Chevy Chase, Md., forever altering the natural line of the rest of their lives.

In the midst of their grief, as a result of their grief, the Singers organized the Alex Singer Project. They published their son's writings and drawings into a book called Alex – Building a Life: The Story of an American Who Fell Defending Israel, Told in His Letters, Journals and Drawings. By doing so, they have harnessed into its own unique, inspiring light the "energy and joy" of Alex's life.

I will tell more of Alex's story, but in his and his parents' words. His story requires, indeed demands, no editorial comment.

"In January 1985, Alex settled permanently in Israel. The next month he entered the army, four years older than the other recruits, a "lone soldier" with no immediate family except his younger brother in Israel. Alex joined the paratroops because he wanted to be with volunteers in the most "active" service and because his brother Daniel was in the paratroops.

"From the time he entered the army, Alex kept with him a journal in a small, black-bound artist's sketchbook."

Feb. 23/24, 1985

Dear Dad, Mom, Benj and Saul [Two of Alex's three brothers],

Here are some reactions to my first 2½ weeks: My favorite new Hebrew term is one used by the "phys. ed." teachers during our nightly exercise periods. When they want us to stretch, they say "more, more – ad sof coev," which means "until the end of pain." I think they mean the far end.

Mar. 22, 1985

I'm one month into basic training now. It has been as difficult physically as its reputation. And nothing compared to what we'll do. I'm told. Before the swearing in we had a hike which was actually pleasant – 25 kilometres with only battle gear and shared jerrycans, etc., from a hilltop on the road to Jerusalem, up to the city, all around the city to the Mount of Olives and views of Jordan, and finally into the Old City itself to the ceremony. At the ceremony, I promised to give my life (even) for this country. That was pretty odd, and saying it really brings into focus what I've done.

(This is a translation of the oath Alex took. "I hereby swear, and fully commit myself, to be faithful to the State of Israel, to its constitution and its authorities, and to take upon myself, without reservations or hesitancy, the rules of discipline of the Israel Defence Force, to obey all commands and orders given by authorized commanders, and to devote all my strengths, and even sacrifice my life, to the defence of my country and the freedom of Israel.")

Dearest Mother,

HAPPY BIRTHDAY

As I sit in the Beit Lid army store waiting to go back to the army for Shabbat, I'm thinking of you, and tears are welling up a bit in my eyes, because when I spend time thinking about you I miss you, and now that it's your 50th birthday how can I but think of you?

And what do I think when I think of you? I think three things. I think gratitude ... I think admiration for how you've raised us, taught us, crated a magazine, been able to change and adapt to science, to teaching, to Israel, to archeology, to editing, to Washington, to everything that's crossed our lives as a family. I admire the way you have taken your children for what each of them is, and added to each of them.

Third, I think of joy. Joy is maybe what I feel most when I think of you, because you take the world so well and that makes me happy ...

June 31, 1985

I'm at the edge of an airfield "somewhere in Israel" waiting for the plane which will take me to my first jump. My parachute is on my back and the sun is shining on my face from just above the eucalyptus trees. I'm not scared, I think ...

I FEEL PROUD TO BE JUMPING AS A PARATROOPER IN THE ISRAELI ARMY. MY DREAM HAS BECOME A REALITY!!

Aug. 17, 1986

Once in a while.
As I progress towards the course's end.
I feel a pang of fear.

Today I felt such fear.

If the war comes
When the war comes
I will have to lead men to die.

But those men were not men a short time ago.
Some don't even shave yet.
And I will have to have the calm power
To yell to them
Or to whisper

Kadima.

And, I will have to have the calm power
To step forward myself.

There is so much more in this remarkable book. As I wrote last week, it is like a sudden ethereal force which touches the heart, inspiring and melancholy. It carries the reader to a high place, a monument of human achievement from which we look out and see very far, "ad sof coev," onto a landscape of courage, sacrifice, mourning and Jewish history.

The book is published by Gefen. Readers may acquire it at local book stores or by arrangement with Suzanne and Max Singer. Phone 301-986-1549. FAX 301-986-5116 or e-mail: Maxsinger@AOL.com

HELP FOR HAIR

HAVE YOUR HAIR PERMED, COLOURED AND HIGHLIGHTED, ALL IN BEAUTIFUL GLORIOUS CONDITION!

We have talked with Mr. Shelley, President of N.A.H.D., world-renowned and Owner of Shelley's Hairstyling. Shelley spent years of research and discovered the use of Amino Acids which "help restore chemically broken bonds in damaged hair."

He also discovered the use of Low Acid products. "The P.H. level is a main ingredient. Just picture numbers from 1-12. Your natural hair level is about P.H.5, regular perms and hair colouring are a much higher P.H. and the higher you go, the more damage will occur. I concentrate on bringing down the P.H. levels of my perms and colours to lower than P.H. 5, which makes them a treatment for the hair. This is a true revolution."

Jewish Funerals?

Over four generations of Jewish families in Toronto have respected burial as one of our religious mitzvot. As a result, through synagogues, societies, Chevra Kadishas and Jewish funeral chapels, Toronto is privileged to be one of the few communities in North America maintaining Jewish control over traditions that have historically held our people together.

It over-simplifies our traditions when non-denominational organizations with no religious affiliation approach "Jewish" burials. A Jewish funeral chapel signifies more than having a Jewish funeral director on the premises. It is one that does not operate on shabbat. It observes the Yom Tovim. It sensitively upholds religious obligations and safeguards cultural customs passed on through many generations of Jews.

Hebrew Basic Burial, a non-profit organization, adheres to the core belief that Jewish funeral and burial services are strictly the responsibility of the Jewish community. Our commitment is to the lowest total cost funeral and burial services offered by any funeral establishment dedicated to serving bereaved Jewish families exclusively.

Yiddish concert draws 1,500

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For the second year in a row, the annual outdoor Yiddish concert in Earl Bales Park was rained out and held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue instead, where 1,500 people stomped up a storm to the hot licks of the Chutzpah Klezmer Band and other entertainers.

Informality was the key and Shalom Aleichem's dictum that "laughter is the best medicine" held sway in the concert that marked the 80th anniversary of the famed Yiddish writer's death.

In response to a plea from Gerry Kane, president of the Yiddish committee of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto, the concert's sponsor, the audience contributed $870 for Yiddish language causes.

"The faint strains of Yiddish are being heard again in the streets," said concert chair Hindy Abelson, noting an increasing number of young people at the concerts. The UJA Federation committee has rescued Jewish culture that otherwise would be lost, Abelson said.

Mezzo-soprano Stella Walker sang old favorites including Di Zun Vet Aruntergoyn while Michael Mandel, a lawyer who sings as a hobby, performed A BildFund Der Alter Haym and Oyfn Pripichik. Mandel noted that Aleichem's mythical town of Kasrilevka, Poland, is the sentimental home of many Toronto residents.

Later, they combined in a duet to sing the rollicking Aktzik Er, Zibetzik Zie(He's 80 and she's 70). The chusen, colla theme was given a comical airing with top-hatted band leader Martin Van de Ven playing the bridegroom and accordianist Sasha Luminsky the over-eager bride. Since the original zemler musicians entertained at weddings in shtetl society, they let loose in this number.

The Toronto Jewish Folk Choir, directed by Esther Ghan Firestone accompanied by Lina Zemelman and Toba Diamond, provided a solid base for the concert by performing, among other numbers, Yiddish is Mein Loshen, Tevye's Hodl, Ot Azoy Nayt a Shnayder and Tsen Brider. Glenn Spurrell and Bruce Hill were soloists.

Both sides blamed for election rhetoric excesses

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Both sides in the recent Israeli election have delegitimized each other, charges prominent New York Rabbi Haskel Lookstein, a lecturer, author and spokesperson for religious Zionism and central Orthodoxy.

Rabbi Lookstein is spiritual leader of Congregation Kehilath Jeshurun and principal of Ramaz School, both in New York.

"They don't recognize that there are two legitimate opinions about Israeli security," he told The CJN in an interview just before a recent dinner for major donors to an Associated Hebrew Schools fundraising drive.

"They almost came to blows over the peace process. I have never seen such sinat chinam (baseless hatred) in either Israel or America."

The fault, he said, lies on both sides.

There is no question that Yigal Amir, the assassin of Yitzhak Rabin, came from the religious Zionist world and "we must question ourselves about how that could have happened."

"But that doesn't mean that all our institutions are culpable."

The religious Zionist point of view, he said, was well expressed by Rabbi Shlomo Aviner of Yeshivat Ateret Cohanim in the Old City of Jerusalem: "We can have passionate beliefs, but overriding everything should be tolerance and a love of all Jews."

He said he hopes the religious parties would use the opportunity provided by their considerable political clout "to demonstrate openness and a concern for the entire people of Israel, and not adopt a narrow policy."

On the other hand, he quoted Robert Rifkind, head of the American Jewish Committee, as having said that he hoped the people of Israel won't turn over the state to "mullahs."

"That's disgraceful, that a man who represents the American Jewish Committee could refer to a whole group of people in such fanatical terms," Rabbi Lookstein said.

He also slammed Rabbi Eric Yoffie, incoming president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations, for "altering his investiture sermon to speak out against the 'fanatics' in Israel, and not giving them a chance to take into consideration the needs of all Israelis."

Rabbi Lookstein said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu "seems to recognize that the priority is peace within Israel. Only then can there be peace between Israel and its neighbors."

Netanyahu, he said, has demonstrated his commitment to bringing the various factions in the country together. "I hope he will strive mightily [to do this] and to move ahead cautiously in search of peace."

Volunteers honored

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Don't ask Anne Herzog when she came to Canada or when she got married.

"I'm here now, what's the difference?" said the lively 90-year-old volunteer, one of 430 honored at an appreciation dinner at Bernard Betel Centre June 12.

Herzog takes the bus from her apartment building at Bathurst and Sheppard streets to the centre, where she collects tickets and admissions for Wednesday afternoon socials, among other duties.

She takes an upbeat view of life, concentrating on the present. "Do you still take a schnapps?" asked The CJN reporter. "Why not? Wouldn't you?" she replied.

Herzog said she didn't know any English when she arrived in Toronto from Russia and soon learned a lot of swear words from her playmates. "I registered in night school and they told me what I was saying wasn't nice."

Once when she was selling raffle tickets for the centre a man threw a $50 bill at her, without even taking a ticket. "I was shivering from excitement, but I didn't give back the $50."

She has one daughter, Debbie Wiseman, two grandchildren and four great-grandchildren, all of Toronto.

She lives nearby and can walk to the centre in good weather. Born in White Russia and raised in Bialystok, she came to Canada in 1929 at the age of 26, betrothed to Morris Cott. They were married for 53 years, Morris dying in 1982.

Describing herself as a woman who worked all her life, Cott said she was a finisher in various garment factories on Spadina Avenue. Though she doesn't remember what her first piece-work rate was, she does remember "kissing the first $10 bill" she earned.

The Cotts had two children, Harold, who died eight years ago, and Evelyn Eisenberg of Toronto. She has nine grandchildren and 18 great-grandchildren, oldest of the latter being 20 and the youngest five.

Evelyn Rabkin, 78, chair of the centre's volunteer commitee, was present, along with her husband, Jack, 83, who has collected $1,000 a year in food tapes for the centre. Evelyn Rabkin said the centre's volunteers have contributed 49,000 hours of work a year.

Kalejs' unit helped 'annihilate' village: witness

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A company of the Arajs Kommando led by Konrads Kalejs took part in an assault on a Russian village in the winter of 1942. In the attack, the village was burned to the ground and all the inhabitants killed, an Immigration adjudicator heard last week.

"After the action, if you can call it that, the commander of my platoon told us about the operation," said Rudolfs Soms, a former private in the Arajs Kommando (AK). "According to the stories that we heard, we know the inhabitants of the village [were] exterminated and we could see that the village had been burned."

Soms' testimony was shown on videotape last week at Kalejs' immigration hearing before adjudicator Anthony Iozzo. The Immigration Department is seeking to remove Kalejs, who is an Australian citizen, from Canada, because of his involvement with the AK, which took part in the murder of more than 30,000 Latvian Jews during World War II.

The videotape testimony was recorded in Latvia in September 1987 for a U.S. deportation case involving Kalejs. Kalejs left the United States in 1994 after U.S. courts ordered him deported. He came to Canada later that year to clear his name, he said.

On the tape, Soms testified he took part in two actions in which Kalejs participated. In the first, Soms' platoon held a position outside the Russian village under attack, while Kalejs led his company inside. Although he didn't see Kalejs, members of the AK later discussed the event, including "members of Kalejs' company ... who had taken part there."

They said the battle ended because "there was nothing more to burn or exterminate," Soms recalled.

A second action at Sanniki was led by German Maj.-Gen. Stahlecker, the comander of all the German killing units on the northern front. The attack force included Kalejs' company and Soms' platoon, which was subordinate to Kalejs' unit. When the SS general was mortally wounded, the assault became disorganized and the attackers took revenge, Soms said.

Kalejs' unit entered the village and from his position outside the village, Soms said he could hear shooting. The village was burned down and "the inhabitants were annihilated," Soms said.

While he did not see Kalejs, other members of the AK later told him he was there. As a commander, he must have been there, Soms added.

Soms' testimony is consistent with earlier videotape testimony involving Harijs (Harry) Svikeris, a former senior officer in the AK. Svikeris was interrogated in 1993 by New Scotland Yard detectives as part of its investigation of Svikeris' role in the killing unit. Svikeris said that after the battle, he left Kalejs in charge while he returned to Riga.

Soms, who worked as a waiter before joining the AK, identified his unit as being commanded by a Lt. Indans. "Kalejs was his superior and Kalejs was responsible to Arajs," Soms said through an interpreter.

When asked about the concentration camp at Salaspils, outside Riga, Soms said he hadn't been there but had heard of conditions there. "One German concentration camp conveys everything," he said.

During the war he heard that prisoners there were forced to dig pits in the camp. It was "senseless labor" that was meant "to kill a person morally. The work made no sense," he said.

AND THE WALLS CAME TUMBLING DOWN...

Every student's dream became reality last week, when a wrecker tore down the 40-year-old Neptune campus of Associated Hebrew Schools. A new, 30,000-square foot Neptune campus will be built thanks to private contributions from the Posluns, Zagdanski and Singer families. [Ron Csillag photo]

New Sephardic rabbinate

Rabbi Assayag feels that the Sephardic Rabbinate of Ontario, as a force for strengthening the Sephardi community, can only enhance the relationship between local Sephardim and the rest of the Jewish community.

"I think the beauty of Judaism is the fact that it's a mosaic. It's important that every detail of the mosaic be emphasized. The mosaic of Jewish life is a serious one that needs to be preserved."

Daily Torah classes run by the new Sephardic Rabbinate's Medrash Torah Vehayim are open to the entire community. Regular lecturers are Rabbis Assayag, Elisha Afriat, Moshe Bensalmon, Shalom Revah, Itamar Cohan and Abraham Kubayov.

The rabbinate and its institute, now in temporary premises, will be housed in the Or Haemet Sephardic School/community centre now being built on Bathurst Street in Thornhill.

Among the 13 affiliate members are the Sephardic Association of Ottawa, the Sephardic Hebra Kadisha and Torat Avot (Yemenite) Congregation.

Fackenheim celebrates 80 years of Jewish living

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite academic honors and the personal experience of 80 years of crucial Jewish history, Emil Fackenheim remains a very human person who loses his house key and sold his Briar Hill Avenue house at the bottom of the real estate market to buy a Jerusalem condominium at a top price.

This picture of the former University of Toronto philosophy professor emerged at a dinner at Holy Blossom Temple as colleagues honored him on his 80th birthday and where he declared his aliyah to Israel as a life-affirming event.

Typical of his deprecating wit and keen insight into the Jewish condition was his account of his present teaching post at the Hebrew University where, he said, he has been demoted to the lowest position of a "professor from abroad." On hearing the news, a Jerusalem friend said, "Good, now you're being treated as dirt, like the rest of us."

As a member of the Holy Blossom Temple family for 50 years, Fackenheim inspired generations of students, said Rabbi Dow Marmur.

"He forced us to confront the Holocaust and to deny Hitler a posthumous victory," said Henrietta Chesnie, a past president. She lamented the absence, through a long illness, of his wife, Rose.

Fellow Holocaust survivor Eric Koch recalled how Fackenheim was arrested as an enemy alien in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1941 by a polite English bobby, who was invited in for tea, despite his mission.

When the German refugee packed 12 volumes of Kant and 42 volumes of Hegel into suitcases, the policeman protested, "But, sir, it's only for a weekend." Fackenheim replied, "You know your business, and I know mine."

When, to bear him out, events led to his incarceration in Canada, he took part in a hunger strike against camp conditions. A major from Ottawa arrived to settle the dispute, Fackenheim recalled, and climbed upon a table to address the inmates: "I understand most of you are Jews, but nevertheless you are expected to keep clean."

Surrounded by children and David, and their spouses, and his youngest child, Yossie, 16, he said the world still does not understand the significance of the founding of Israel in 1948. He will remain in Israel until the Mashiach arrives, he joked, and then return to Canada.

As a house guest, Fackenheim is both "fun" and a "headache" because he loses his key and forgets his underwear, said hostess Kitty Wintrob.

Prof. Bob McCrae recalled that Fackenheim's insatiable curosity drove him to climb a tree at the McCrae's cottage and then he couldn't get down.

Prof. Henry Fishel, of the University of Indiana, a student with Fackenheim in Berlin, and a friend for 60 years, said when they were standing in line at a German concentration camp, Fackenheim advised everyone to take off their glasses, "so they won't think we're intellectuals."

As a result, Emil, without glasses, was blinking in the sunlight when a Nazi asked him what he wanted to be. "A public school teacher," was the reply. "You are too stupid for that,' the German shot back.

Humorist and friend Allan Gould said Fackenheim could make a new suit look 20 years old. "When he went into Harry Rosen's and asked to see 'something cheap in a suit' the salesman said, 'the mirror is right over there.'"

Other reminiscences were given by Michael Morgan, a colleague at the University of Indiana.

It was an electric moment for most of us, 20 years ago today, delivered in the briefest flash of information over the radio, across the television screen or in a dream-like phone call. It jolted us to the very essence of our beings. An instant later, as the news spread from household to household, the entire world seemed to light up like a gigantic neon billboard glowing with incredulity and pride.

On Sunday June 27, 1976, an Air France plane with a large number of Israeli passengers was hijacked by four terrorists, two Palestinians and two Germans, who had boarded in Athens. The plane eventually landed in Uganda. Idi Amin, Uganda's brutal dictator, was complicit in the hijacking, his troops standing guard over the hostages along with the terrorists. In an eerie, frightening throwback to the Nazi brutality of a mere 35 years earlier, the Israeli passengers were separated from the rest.

On July 3, at 3:30 p.m., Israel sent a special commando force to Entebbe to rescue the beleaguered hostages. Seven hours later, more than 2,000 miles away from the skies over Israel, the rescue was underway. Less than an hour after the first IDF soldiers emerged from their military transport in Entebbe, the hostages were safely aboard an IDF Air Force plane on their way home.

Three of the hostages lost their lives in the rescue operation. One of the hostages, 73-year-old Dora Bloch, who had been evacuated previously to a hospital in Kampala, was killed by Idi Amin's thugs. IDF Sergeant Sorin Herscu was severely wounded and became a quadriplegic, paralyzed in all four limbs. Lt.-Col. Jonathan "Yoni" Netanyahu, the field commander of the operation, was killed saving the hostages.

It was an act of daring, of precision and of high morality. Its importance to modern history can never be overstated. Former president of Israel Chaim Herzog has described that importance. "Apart from the message to the world at large, the IDF action at Entebbe delivered a special message to the Jewish people, telling them clearly and dramatically that ... they are not alone. Throughout the two millennia of exile and persecution - and particularly during the dark night of the Nazi Holocaust - the Jews had been helpless and isolated, with no one to protect them ... as opposed to the past, wherever Jews are in danger, they know that someone is worrying about them. They may sometimes find themselves living in fear, but never again do they have to live without hope."

The generation born after July 4, 1976 may not know of Entebbe, or may know of it only as the subject of a late-night movie. For their sake it is imperative that this magnificent story be retold. For our sake too - we who felt that electrifying jolt - it is imperative that the anniversary be remembered.

A CJN anniversary

A different anniversary, much less significant than Entebbe in the scheme of Jewish history, should also be noted for the readers of The CJN.

Twenty-five years ago, on July 9, 1971, The Canadian Jewish News was purchased from M. J. Nurenberger's company, North American Press Ltd. by three Toronto businessmen, Murray B. Koffler, Albert J. Latner and the late Ray D. Wolfe, the president of the paper until his death in 1990. Koffler and Latner are still directors of The CJN. Speaking for the new directors, Wolfe said "The new management intends to open the pages of the newspaper to diverse opinions within the Jewish community and to establish The Canadian Jewish News as a community forum." Five editors later, that is still our aim. Beginning next week on page 2, for an entire year, The CJN will carry brief summaries of national and international stories that appeared in the paper 25 years ago.

Disagrees with David Frum's political buddies

The article quotes Maimonides (through Frum) as including in his eight steps of charity, "It's hard to make a Jewish case for a system where (people) remain dependent on the state for generation after generation."

Nobody is making a case for people to remain dependent upon the state. If Frum was really familiar with Maimonides' writing, charity or tzedakah is defined as a command, not just a good deed. Frum also states that "charity must be combined with self reliance." This can only be accomplished by creating jobs, not by firing gainfully employed people. People of Frum's philosophical persuasion have been taking away through "downsizing," even though their companies have been earning substantial profit.

As well, Frum's political buddies have been reducing the accessibility of higher education by raising tuition fees, cutting back on almost every area of health care (i.e. decreasing the number of beds, reducing nursing staff and closing hospitals), reducing day care for children and as a result making it impossible for many mothers to go to work.

We should not be referring to right or left wing or conservatives and liberals but rather to the kind of society we want to live in. Do we want a society in which only those with the financial means can acquire their basic needs, or do we believe it is the function of society to provide for health care, education and welfare, for those who do not have the means to support themselves and their children.

To my sorrow, Frum supports the former. Jewish tradition, I believe would support the latter.

"Prisoner 88' is a Righteous Gentile

Recently I happened to watch the documentary aired on TVOntario Prisoner 88 and was moved by Zygmund Sobolewski's outpouring of emotion at what he witnessed in the Auschwitz death camp.

I wish to thank Sobolewski for telling the world of the treatment and genocide of innocent men, women and children, whose only guilt was to be born Jewish or to be of Jewish descent.

At a time when many Poles ignore the issue of the development of a mall at Auschwitz and complain instead that the Jewish groups were "monopolizing" Auschwitz, he came out openly, telling the truth of Auschwitz and condemning these attitudes.

"Do not stand idly by the blood of your neighbor," teaches the Bible (Leviticus 19:16). Sobolewski was definitely not in a position to prevent the atrocities, but his conscience dictated to him to reveal and denounce what he had witnessed.

When these truths are written or told by Jews who miraculously survived the horrors, they are treated as grossly exaggerated, but coming from a Catholic, they sound more truthworthy.

He was not made a slave to blind racial prejudice, the curse of humanity. Being a practising Catholic, Sobolewski didn't hesitate to blame the Church and the Pope, his highest religious authority, for keeping silent in the face of this terrible Holocaust.

I consider Sobolewski a Righteous Gentile for perpetuating the holy memory of the martyrs.

God willing he will find reward in serving as a personal example to his sons of a humane spirit with unbiased judgment and courage, and they will hopefully follow in his footsteps.

Chickens home to roost in Israeli election

It is now 15 years since Israel's bombing of Iraq's nuclear facility in 1981. In his book Tamuz in Flames, the author Mr. Nakdimon documents the intense opposition faced by former prime minister Menachem Begin when he tried to gain support for a military strike of Iraq's nuclear facility, specifically from his political opponents on the political left. This included Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres, Ezer Weizman, Yigal Yadin and particularly Chaim Herzog. Notwithstanding this opposition, Begin persisted in his determination to eliminate the threat posed by a nuclear-armed Iraq.

It is almost shocking when one considers that although the operation was a total success, Begin immediately came under attack from the above political leaders. Specifically, the raid was denounced as "political opportunism" as well as an "election ploy" on the part of Begin. Can one imagine the repercussions of a nuclear-armed Iraq today?

Begin is owed a debt of gratitude by all for his foresight and perseverance in the face of opposition. The recent defeat of the left in the Israeli election was also a defeat of these same political figures who criticized the Israeli right back in 1981 and are doing so again now.

Entebbe: a unique phenomenon in history

By DANIEL BLOCH

The Entebbe rescue operation was a unique phenomenon in world history. For the first time a small country, neither a big power nor a colonial one, mounted a successful military operation in a far away country, in order to save the lives of a few of its citizens.

There is no doubt that July 3, 1976 was a historic turning point in the combat against terrorism. The Israeli army, with its wonderful combination of an elite commando unit and the world-renowned Israeli Air Force and with the help of excellent planning and logistic services, had proven that there was a way to fight hijacking, the modern version of piracy.

Entebbe had a special message for Israelis and for all the Jewish people around the world, about the importance of the existence of the Jewish state of Israel: it is not a country like any other country. Its existence, power and moral strength are not just for the sake of those who happen to live within its boundaries. It is a country that cares for Jews and Israelis wherever they are. Israel was established as a state that cares about the fate of Jews everywhere. This is the lesson learned from 2,000 years of exile, from the terrible days of the Holocaust: Never again. Wherever they are, Jews can feel that they are not alone.

Jewish solidarity manifests itself not only in words, demonstrations, financial aid or moral support, but in political and diplomatic work and when needed, in military action too.

In Israel, this event showed once again that all Israelis feel like one big family in times of trouble and distress. It seems that everybody had a relative, friend or acquaintance among the hostages. If not, he surely knew one of the soldiers participating in the rescue mission. The name of Jonathan Netanyahu is well remembered by all — and not because of his brother's political career.

Many boys born after July 4, 1976 were named Jonathan. My son is one of the many Jonathans of that period and in every group he has been part of, in kindergarten, school and youth movements, or now in his army unit, he has never been the only one with that name. Usually there are more than two or three.

The name of my late mother, Dora Bloch, is also known and cherished in every house and family. Two kindergartens were named after her — one in Jerusalem adjacent to the Jonathan Netanyahu Elementary School, and the other one in Tel Aviv. She became a symbol of Jewish suffering — the sacrificial lamb, suffering the primitive revenge of a bloody dictator, Idi Amin, who cooperated with international terrorists.

Our main consolation lies in the fact that my mother's murder gave rise to worldwide outcries that helped bring down Amin.

We will never forget the bravery of many people in Uganda, among them the doctor who tried to save her life and had to run away until Amin was out of power. Today he is the minister of health in the government of Uganda. The nurses in the hospital kept her belongings in spite of all the dangers.

The medal for bravery and for humane behavior should go to the residents of a small village near Kampala. They witnessed the original attempt by the secret police to burn my mother's body, an effort which was unsuccessful because of the high humidity. Eventually, the police simply left the body in the forest. The villagers hurried and buried the body in the forest, putting up a sign that would be understood only by them. They then succeeded in notifying British Intelligence of the burial. Thus, after President Lule replaced Amin, our family was able to find the body and bring our mother to Jerusalem for burial.

We will never know what our mother felt or knew just before she was taken away from the hospital and murdered. We just know of the visit to her by the British vice-consul in Kampala and his wife only a few hours before her death. They did not tell her about the successful rescue mission. She seemed to be in a good mood. Her only request was for some European-style food, as she could not eat the local menu. Her visitors promised to come back with food, but when they returned, she had already disappeared.

The vice-consul never forgave himself for not staying with her. We told him not to take any blame upon himself. Similarly, we told the doctor who had decided to keep her longer at the hospital that he should not blame himself. Given the state of Idi Amin's mind, nothing would have helped her.

Dora Bloch belonged to a pioneering Zionist family. Many members of her family died in battle to fulfil the Zionist dream. Many of them died alone, far away from their family and friends. Her father, Joseph Feinberg, immigrated from Russia in 1882 and was one of the 10 founders of Rishon L'Zion. When the first settlers encountered difficulties, he was sent to Europe and succeeded in convincing Baron Edmund de Rothschild to support the establishment of agricultural settlements in Israel.

Several years later, he headed a farmers' rebellion against the administration sent by the baron to manage the affairs of the villages. Feinberg was forced to leave his home, because Rothschild had threatened to cut off all support for Rishon L'Zion. My grandfather settled in Jaffa and tried several business ventures, but all of them failed. Sick and tired, he went to recuperate in Jericho, where he died far away from his family. My mother was only 2 years old when she lost her father.

She was a homemaker. She dedicated her life to her family and to volunteering, mainly helping new immigrants. She spoke seven languages fluently including Arabic. She had many Arab friends and she believed in peace. She was certain that, deep inside, most Arabs and Palestinians wanted to put an end to tears and bloodshed. She had warm memories of the almost 20 years that she lived in Egypt. She was killed only 18 months before the historical peace initiative of Sadat of Egypt.

When I first landed in Egypt as a reporter covering the peace negotiations, I felt so sad that my mother could not witness those great events. She always dreamed of being able to once again visit the country she had left in 1923, but fate decided otherwise.

It is already 20 years since Entebbe. Memories are fresh, emotions are undiminished. Despite all our ideological and political differences, all Israelis are united in their recognition of the need to have a strong and sophisticated army, an army that can fight against any foe, regular armies as well as terrorists, an army that can help Jews and Israelis in times of great and imminent danger, anywhere in the world, an army that will always assure us that we are not alone.

Opinions

A tribute to my readers

It has been over a year since I began writing this column. It is time to share with you some reaction to its opinions. Let me begin by saying that I have been pleasantly surprised by many of the calls I have received and the comments passed along (often across the country). It is very gratifying to know that people are reacting to what was said, whether they agree with me or not.

By Jean M. Gerber

I was pleased that people read my critique of fundamentalist Christian efforts to appear as friends of Israel while at the same time harboring right-wing, sometimes extreme, attitudes towards social issues such as abortion and social justice. Several of these groups and individuals have recently demonstrated that they hold racist opinions as well as anti-Jewish views.

Let me say that I remain an outspoken advocate of dialogue with people of other faiths. Such dialogue must, however, be grounded in respect for each religion. Honest dialogue can only bring us closer together. We should be aware, however, that conversionist tendencies are still present. A Southern Baptist denomination has recently affirmed its intention to devote major resources towards the conversion of Jews. We must distance ourselves from those who would convert — an overt rejection of Judaism as a valid faith — and those who would use religion as a means to subvert democratic choices, no matter what lip service they pay to Israel.

I was surprised that many people asked for reprints of my article on Jews by choice. My appreciation to all those who wrote or called me with stories to share. One needs to be shared with you, since it puzzles me. My caller was very frank. While she valued her friends who are Jews by choice, she would rather not have her children marry one. She wants Jewish in-laws, with whom she can share common ground. Perhaps other readers have the same feelings. Can they explain them? I would like to understand.

My pre-Israel election article received strong reactions, both positive and negative. I was, however, wrong; obviously Israelis are ready to condone strong representation of ultra-religious parties in a government that shows many signs of ambivalence on the peace process. One conversation regarding this stands out. "Israel is a Jewish state," my caller said, "and not a binational state, or a secular state. The religious parties will make sure that Israel stands for traditional Jewish values. The secular Zionists were against these."

The columns that generated the most heat were those concerned with women's issues. I obviously touched cords, both of hostility and agreement. I do appreciate that people take the time to write to me and share their thoughts, even if they are dramatically opposed to mine. I can only say that I would never force someone to do something they found objectionable, but I staunchly defend the right of women to seek opportunities for full public participation in prayer and full equality in Jewish scholarship and the process of developing Halachah.

Finally, however, I report with sadness that one column seems to have gone unread by those who I wish would read it. A recent letter to The CJN came from a family struggling to find a place where their child could receive a Jewish education along with other Jewish children. When I wrote about Jews with special needs, I was addressing that very issue, the issue of communal responsibility to see that all Jews are included in regular community benefits, a major one of which is access to a Jewish education for children with special challenges. In fact, of course, it is we who are challenged to provide for all children the best Jewish education we can, rather than sweeping grandly past the child who needs more.

With our wealth and resources, can't we do better? Surely with all our institutional will we can find a place for every Jew. Even if that institutional will is lacking, we have an obligation: all Jews have a portion in the Jewish world and it is our responsibility to see that they enjoy that portion.

Thank you all for calling, writing, reading.

This new Merchant is brilliant

Douglas Rain, the actor who supplied the voice of Hal in Stanley Kubrick's 2001, A Space Odyssey, has changed my mind about Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice, one of the Stratford's Festival's offerings for the 1996 season.

By Arnold Ages

Since its inauguration in 1953, Stratford has presented The Merchant of Venice many times and on the three occasions I saw it, the play, no matter how skilfully produced, left me feeling distressed at best and revolted at worst.

The force of the malignant anti-Semitism which is at the core of the play and which is intensified by the ghoulish "pound of flesh" courtroom episode has never successfully been masked or diminished by any sympathetic production of the work.

Until Rain and this, the most edifying and brilliant rendering of The Merchant since the beginning of the Stratford Festival of Ontario.

Rain brings to the role of Shylock a presence and a dignity that have only been hinted at by other actors. Rain's resonant voice, matchless diction, dignified bearing and indefinable aura of authority transform the moneylender into a noble victim of circumstances dictated by the pressures of Christendom.

The mastery of the role that Rain exhibits in the play can be seen in his very first appearance. Antonio agrees to sign a loan for Bassanio (who needs the money to pursue Portia, the wealthy heiress) with Shylock, who agrees to advance 3,000 ducats without interest, but with the quirky and diabolical stipulation that failure to pay the loan would lead to the forfeiture of a pound of flesh.

In this first encounter, Shylock-Rain delivers himself of a powerful indictment of the way in which Antonio has besmirched his name with slanderous allegations about his Jewish "wickedness." In that short speech, Rain's Shylock manages to evoke eloquently the atmosphere of Christianity's age-old teaching of contempt for Jews. Compared to Shylock's magisterial intonations about the Jewish fate under Christianity, Antonio's response is tepid and anemic.

In a recent article in Commentary magazine, a Shakespearean scholar argues that Shylock's most famous speech — "Hath not a Jew eyes?" — traditionally described by critics as Shakespeare's plea for tolerance, is of relatively little consequence because Shylock's eloquent words are delivered in prose and to secondary characters and not to the principals in the play.

When I read this critique, I immediately agreed with the writer's thesis, that is to say, if Shakespeare's agenda had been to promote more tolerant attitudes towards Jews, he would have had Shylock's poignant defence of Jewish humanity directed to Antonio or Bassanio.

However, the potency of this argument was neutralized for me by Rain's delivery of that great soliloquy. The fact that it was directed at secondary personages was of no consequence. Rain's rendering of Shakespeare's poetic prose was such that it filled not only the stage but the entire Avon Theatre, engulfing the audience with its powerful images of Jewish dignity and vulnerability. No one in the audience at that moment was even aware of the characters to whom the remarks were directed.

Much of the success of this Merchant of Venice comes, as has been indicated, from Rain's impeccable phrasing and diction — the verbal counterparts of his sartorial elegance. This Shylock is no Dickensian Fagin with stereotypical ghetto gait and stooped back. Rain's Shylock stands erect at all times and faces his tormentors in and out of court with integrity.

In those instances when his voice waivers and quivers — when Shylock learns of the desertion of his daughter Jessica and her theft of family jewels — Rain introduces pain, anger, pathos and melancholy into the father's anguished response. Rain even manages to mute Shylock's greedy preoccupation with the theft of the jewels rather than with the loss of his daughter by using lower registers of the voice to record that Shakespearean bow to contemporary English anti-Semitism.

It should be said, of course, that not even Rain's considerable talent can diminish the venom against Jews which flows from the courtroom scene's assault upon Shylock, where Antonio's comrades heap scorn upon the merciless moneylender. The latter's reputation is sullied even more with Portia's "The quality of mercy is not strained," monologue.

Still, even at the play's denouement, with Shylock's defeat, humiliation and impending conversion to Christianity, Rain manages to instil into his depiction of this hapless individual more than a tincture of defiance, grace and nobility — this in spite of Shakespeare's malevolent script. Rain has created one of the greatest Shylocks of all times.

Snitching

The Ontario government has announced that it will institute a program of riding herd on "aggressive drivers." Now everyone who operates an automobile knows the kind of driver who uses his vehicle to wind in and out of traffic, occasionally forcing you to the curb in order to avoid a collision, and whom you instantly recognize as a danger on the road. I say "his" because such individuals are usually male and under 25 years of age; and psychologists add their bit by analyzing these jockeys as either rebellious youth or socially retarded individuals who want to taste "power" by practising brinkmanship, thereby endangering others as well as themselves.

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

I don't know how the OPP will manage to curtail this phenomenon without putting a fair number of officers on the road. In any case, they have called on the public to cooperate and use cellular phones or other means of communication to report these road pests.

But that appeal does not sit right with some citizens, if I am to believe the latest radio reports. They call this "snitching," and they remember from their school days that this was the greatest sin a student could commit. He or she would automatically be ostracized for such behavior — however beneficial it might be to the cause of honesty, fairness or decency. Whatever offence another student had committed, snitching was considered worse by one's peers.

This same phenomenon, I learned, also surrounds the case of the so-called Unabomber. You will remember that some months ago, the FBI arrested Theodore Kaczynski, believing he was the one who had killed and injured a number of people in order to proclaim that modern technology was killing us all. Part of the fascination with this alleged perpetrator was the fact that his own brother David had alerted the authorities. David felt that his brother was a danger to the public and that he would likely commit further mayhem. In order to prevent this, he turned his brother in, so the story goes.

Recently an article appeared in the Los Angeles Times, where Michael Ventura criticized not the Unabomber, but his brother David, and called the latter — not the former — morally deficient, so that "no one will ever be able to fully trust David Kaczynski." In other words, the brother snitched and snitching was worse on the scale of moral values than the possibility that his brother might commit further crimes.

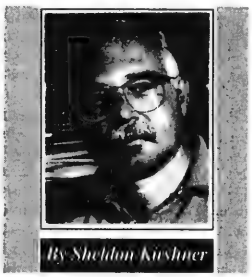
The snitcher is thus portrayed as the ultimate untrustworthy person — another aspect of the reversion of our value system. Right becomes wrong, and wrong becomes attractive. Criminals are adored for their macho and daring, and those who turn them in are spoilers of the game. Which means, of course, that the line between moral and immoral is blurred beyond recognition.

Jewish tradition has something to say about this. The Torah warns us: "Do not be a tale-bearer, but neither should you stand idly by the blood of your brother" (Leviticus 19:16). This has generally been understood as an obligation to do something in order to prevent evil.

The Kirshner File

Circumstances surrounding 1946 pogrom remain a mystery

On July 4, 1946, 42 Jews were murdered and more than 60 wounded by a mob in the Polish city of Kielce.



By Sheldon Kirshner

Fifty years later, the Kielce pogrom remains a unique phenomenon — the worst pogrom in post-war European history.

To this day, the circumstances surrounding the pogrom remain a mystery. Was it a spontaneous outbreak, or was it planned? Was it an explosive manifestation of popular anti-Semitism, or was it a cynical plot by the Soviet Union to discredit anti-Communist elements in Poland and abroad?

Whatever its origins, the pogrom, summoning up graphic images of blood libel, is an ugly blot on Poland (which, before the Holocaust, was home to 3.3 million Jews).

The current Polish government is aware that the pogrom — which was widely condemned by Poles — stained Poland's reputation and embittered Polish-Jewish relations. Last January, Foreign Minister Dariusz Rosati of Poland issued an apology to the World Jewish Congress. But among Polish Jews, the pain, the anguish and the anger persist.

When World War II ended, something like 200 Jews lived in Kielce, less than one percent of its pre-Holocaust population. The survivors, the majority of whom had found refuge in the Soviet Union during the hostilities, returned to a country which had been devastated by a German occupation and was locked in a fierce power struggle that Communist forces would handily win.

The pogrom was sparked by rumor and inflamed by anti-Jewish resentment. In some respects, it was remarkably similar to the Menahem Mendel Beilis case in Russia in 1911 (which inspired American novelist Bernard Malamud to write The Fixer).

The tragedy in Kielce unfolded when a Polish boy, Henryk Blaszczyk, claimed that he and other Christian children had been kidnapped and taken to a basement in a building at 7 Planty St. Militiamen entered the building, which housed Jewish social and religious institutions as well as most of the town's Jews. They found neither children nor a cellar. Nevertheless, a crowd began to harass the Jews. Violence flared and Jews were killed in cold blood. Members of the militia and soldiers joined in the orgy of killing.

One hundred people were arrested for participating in the mayhem. Following a trial, nine of the perpetrators were sentenced to death. The government promised an investigation, but a report was never released.

Instead, the Communist authorities declared that the pogrom had been fomented by the anti-Communist underground in collusion with the Polish Peasants' party. Moral responsibility for the pogrom was attributed to the Roman Catholic church.

According to Michael Checinski (Poland: Communism, Nationalism, Anti-Semitism), a former Polish intelligence officer, the pogrom may well have been planned by the Soviet and Polish security services as part of a calculated plot to tighten Moscow's grip on Poland.

This theory is supported by a booklet (Kielce — July 4, 1946) published by the Polish Educational Foundation in North America. It claims: "The pogrom ... was timed for anti-Polish propaganda purposes to persuade the Western powers that Poland should remain a colony of the Soviets."

True or not, one should not lose sight of the fact that the pogrom was ultimately a deep-seated expression of visceral anti-Semitism.

In the wake of the war, anti-Jewish sentiments were rife in Poland. The German occupation had exacerbated traditional anti-Semitism. To that may be added two more factors: an unwillingness by Poles to relinquish property to their Jewish owners, and a perception among Poles that the Communist takeover had been accomplished with the visible assistance of Jews and that Jews were too prominently represented in the government.

Jews, diehard Communists, were indeed prominent in Poland's post-war regimes. The most notable of these office-holders were Jakub Berman, Hilary Minc and Roman Zambrowski, all of whom were assimilated Jews who had little or no contact with the organized Jewish community. Jews were particularly over-represented in the hated security apparatus, a fact that was bitterly resented by right-wing Polish nationalists.

"The first cadres of the Polish Communist party in 1945... were composed of men in uniform, a very large proportion of them intellectuals of Jewish descent," writes the Polish poet Czeslaw Milosz, who is not unfriendly to Jews. "The Russians regarded them as more reliable instruments of Soviet desires in the belief that they would be less inclined to Polish patriotism because of the discrimination to which the Polish rightists had subjected them before the war."

As a result of such perceptions and feelings, anti-Semitic violence rocked Poland in the post-war period. Prior to Kielce, pogroms erupted in Rzeszow and in Krakow. And in December 1945, a grenade was thrown into the Jewish community centre in Kielce. (By the summer of 1947, approximately 1,500 Polish Jews had been slain in assaults in 155 localities, writes Jaff Shatz in The Generation: The Rise and Fall of Jewish Communists in Poland.

All agree that these incidents drove up the rate of Jewish emigration, even though, paradoxically enough, the Communist regime was allegedly committed to a policy of reviving Jewish life in Poland.

The role of the Catholic church in the Kielce pogrom is still debated.

August Hlond, the primate of Poland, officially condemned it. But he went one step further. Cardinal Hlond claimed that anti-Semitism was due "to the Jews who today occupy leading positions in Poland's government and endeavor to introduce a governmental structure that the majority of the Poles do not wish to have."

The bishop of Lublin, reiterating this view, added: "The Germans murdered the Jewish nation because the Jews were the propagators of Communism."

In fact, although a disproportionate number of Jews belonged to the Communist party, Jews did not bring Communism to Poland. Nor were the vast majority of Polish Jews sympathetic to Communism.

Be that as it may, many Poles were convinced that there was a direct relationship between Jews and Communism. They bought the nefarious myth of Zydo-Komuna (Jewish Communism).

Certainly, the Catholic church appears to have been receptive to this notion. This may explain its reluctance to stand up courageously to anti-Semitism.

In May 1946, just two months before the Kielce pogrom, Rabbi David Kahane, a Polish Jewish leader, requested a pastoral letter from the church condemning anti-Semitism. Rabbi Kahane and others also submitted a memorandum in which they warned of the dangers of anti-Semitic violence if the church did not raise its voice.

Cardinal Hlond, who in 1936 had advocated an economic boycott against Jewish businesses, returned the memorandum via his secretary, and a pastoral letter was not issued, according to historian Michal Borwicz.

Still more disheartening, the bishop of Kielce, three weeks before the pogrom, also refused to release a pastoral letter on the subject.

On the day of the pogrom, a local Jewish leader tried to telephone the bishop's residence to ask for intervention. Borowicz claims that the bishop's office refused to grant him a connection, and that in the wake of the pogrom the bishop declined to sign a statement denouncing the onslaught.

The bishop did release a separate declaration decrying the bloody events in Kielce. But by then, it was too late.

Vanished world

Recently, I tuned in to a PBS television documentary entitled Shtetl, fully expecting to be transported into a vanished world which, predictably, has been romanticized by outsiders who never personally tasted the hardship and isolation of a struggling East European village.

And while Marian Marzynski's riveting three-hour film offered a glimpse of what the shtetl may have been like in its heyday, Marzynski had bigger fish to fry. He was really interested in a far more sensitive and divisive topic — the nature of Jewish-Polish relations, now and during World War II.

Marzynski, a naturalized American who was born in Warsaw and hidden in a Catholic orphanage during the Holocaust, accompanied Nathan Kaplan to Bransk, whose Jewish population was all but decimated in Treblinka in 1942.

Kaplan, a resident of Chicago, was drawn to Bransk, his father's birthplace, by a 29-year-old amateur historian named Zbyszek Romaniuk, a Catholic who possessed more than a passing knowledge of the Polish city's Jewish dimension.

Romaniuk was not only familiar with Bransk's Jewish past, of which there is little trace today. On his own initiative, he had returned Jewish gravestones — which cynically had been used by the Germans for reinforcing local roads — to Bransk's Jewish cemetery.

When Romaniuk returns to Bransk from edifying trips to the United States and Israel — where he visits the U.S. Holocaust Museum and where he has an uncomfortable encounter with Israeli high school students who doubt his sincerity — he finds offensive graffiti on the walls of his home: "Jew" and "Shabbos goy." Plainly, some of his fellow Poles are unhappy with his philo-Semitism.

Zbyszek Romaniuk

Their attitude is not altogether surprising: Poles in Bransk, perhaps unwillingly, collaborated with the Germans, and still harbor stereotypical views of Jews.

Even Romaniuk is influenced by this corrosive social climate. In planning celebrations for Bransk's 500th anniversary, Romaniuk, the deputy mayor, deliberately omits all references to its former Jewish inhabitants. Jews, he explains somewhat embarrassingly, no longer live in Bransk. And the people of Bransk, quite honestly, feel ill at ease with Jews, who are normally associated with wealth and seen as cunning and clannish.

Oh, yes, the local band plays Fiddler on the Roof as Bransk enjoys its celebration. But for all intents and purposes, the Jews are not part of it. They have been calculatingly excised from Bransk's history.

Anne Frank could teach us all

By JOEL RAY

Guest Voices

Recently, I rediscovered the life and philosophy of a heroine whose memory forms a beacon for Jews and their brethren, as we move further away from the shiver of World War II and the despicable, yet sometimes courageous deeds of the time. Anne Frank Remembered is a poignant cinematographic expression of survival and morality, at a time when the world was undergoing unthinkable changes.

All of us can learn from the life and writings of Anne Frank. We may come to understand that solitude and isolation are vital ingredients in our own lives if we are to gain an understanding of ourselves and the world around us. It is solitude that generates reflection, wrote Maimonides, which in turn enables us to acknowledge the universe and our role therein.

Frank's written work echoed the life of a troubled teenager (which gives it its human appeal), but it was also a cry for hope and optimism and a love for life. The diary was not solely written by the author for her own introspection, but was intended to be read by others at some later date. It reveals the true loss of World War II — loss of the human being as a person rather than an object or number — and it is the magnitude of such loss that makes us weep as we watch the film and the story of Frank's life.

In the midst of the lonely, melancholic tone set by the movie, Anne Frank Remembered delivers an even greater message. It points out acts of goodness, as demonstrated by the Frank family's friends and employees who hid and sustained them for more than two years within the secret canal apartment in Amsterdam. The documentary perpetuates the literal truth that many non-Jews placed their lives on the line to save Jews.

The segments with Miep (Santrouschitz) Gies, the former secretary and friend of Otto Frank, are moving beyond description. Gies' commitment to maintaining the Frank family within their hideout was of major proportion and involved great risk. The greatest strength revealed about Gies during her numerous interviews is her degree of compassion and humility. The sombre, almost impersonal tone that she exhibits during the film reinforces the notion that her actions more than 50 years ago were based on a given: "that it was the right thing to do." There was, and still is, no need for Gies to hesitate or reflect upon this.

As the film ends, we are left with little else, but to ask, "How can I help the many modern-day Anne Franks who are oppressed by cruelty and circumstance within the inner cities and slums of Rio, Bombay or Guatemala?" Yet, we hesitate and are uncertain about our role in these people's lives.

Anne Frank Remembered reminds us, as Jews, to isolate, reflect and acknowledge that there are so many young people with hopes and dreams to be actualized by our intervention; or to be left to whither away silently, never to be heard from or read about or known.

Newspaper's past explored by author

The Paper's Papers by Richard F. Sheppard, Random House $42

In 1883, Adolph Ochs, the youthful owner of Tennessee's Chattanooga Times, married Effie, the vivacious daughter of Isaac Mayer Wise, president of the Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati and America's best known rabbi. Thirteen years later, Ochs bought the nearby bankrupt New York Times, which is still owned and operated by the fourth generation of Ochs' descendants.

In The Paper's Paper. Richard Sheppard, who worked as a reporter, editor and columnist on the Times for over 40 years, delves into the paper's huge archive and reveals for the first time some of the behind the scenes problems, concerns, debates and decisions.

Some of these are Jewish in nature. Ochs and his son-in-law and successor, Arthur Hays Sulzberger, regarded their Jewish faith as a religion, with no ethnic or national overtones. They were anxious to keep any trace of favoritism toward Jewish causes far from their readers.

It is no surprise that they were opposed to Zionism. In 1920, Sulzberger wrote, "I am truly grateful that I was born a Jew because of the rich inheritance that I have received thereby. I feel that I have profited from the prejudice which I know exists around me, but which fortunately has not often touched me. I think it has tended to make me more aggressive — more alert — more broadminded and tolerant. And so I deem it a privilege to 'stand up and be counted' as a Jew. I have a Jewish feeling — a Jewish religion — must I take what for me is a step backwards in order to show it?"

As Hitler was coming to power in Germany, Ochs declined an invitation to attend a testimonial dinner for Samuel Untermyer in honor of his work for persecuted Jews. Untermyer was a prominent New York Jewish lawyer and social reformer.

Ochs wrote, "I am not in agreement with Mr. Untermyer in the wisdom of an international organization of Jews to combat the uncivilized and inhuman German regime, for I fear a strictly Jewish crusade may do more harm than good.

"I believe the condemnation of Germany should be universal, embracing all creeds and races who believe in 'liberty, equality and fraternity.' "

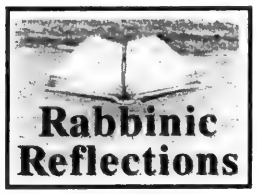
In 1947, when the United Nations voted the partition of Palestine, the Times was sufficiently anti-Zionist to arouse strong feelings for a "Jewish boycott" of the paper. This protest fizzled as the Times gradually adopted a more moderate position towards the State of Israel.

The author describes the reluctance of the paper in the early years to bring so called "social news" about blacks or Jews. An enraged rabbi wrote that among the many items published, there did not seem to be a single Jewish name nor any reference to any social happening in any Jewish family. The letter concluded, "I am loath to believe that Anti-Jewish bigotry could have been the reason for the non-publication of an item concerning a social event in my family, or any other Jewish family, in the columns of a newspaper ... of which you are the editor and proprietor."

In this wide-ranging account of the growth and evolution of a great newspaper, we learn of the debate over the relative virtues of running or refusing tobacco advertising, the tremendous furor occasioned by the publication of the famous Pentagon Papers, the guest list that was compiled for a luncheon honoring Winston Churchill, the debates about introducing a bridge column and a crossword puzzle and the decision to allow the word "gay" to be used in place of "homosexual."

The book also offers more than 120 photographs, cartoons, letters and reproductions from the archives.

With its proud motto, "All the News that's Fit to Print" still untarnished, the Times moves majestically into the electronic age, "Too big to read, too important not to."



By RABBI
REUVEN TRADBURKS

Now that we are back in the land of Israel, prosperous and gathering all the exiles into the land, is it still necessary to observe mourning for the destruction of the Temples?

Beginning this Thursday with Shiva Asar b'Tammuz, we observe increasing degrees of mourning for the destruction of the first and second temples, culminating with Tisha b'Av. During this time we don't have weddings, listen to music or cut our hair. These are all normal practices of a mourner. The one thing that is missing is the kriah, the ripping of the garments before the funeral. However, we do this too, but in a different time and place.

The Talmud states that one ought to do kriah upon seeing the cities of Yehuda in ruins. One ought also to do kriah upon seeing the city of Jerusalem in ruins. Similarly, one ought to do kriah upon seeing the Temple Mount in Jerusalem in ruins. Should we still do these various kriahs in our time? After all, the cities of Yehuda are being rebuilt. The city of Jerusalem is more built up now than at any time in history (at least in the physical size of the city and possibly also in size of population). Should we be tearing our garments when we see the glory of modern day Jerusalem or should we be saying a l'chaim?

Rav Hershel Schachter, the rosh kollel at Yeshiva University, makes an important distinction in these kriahs. The Land of Israel has significance to us in two ways, political and religious. This is the land that we have a mitzvah to settle and to govern.

The seat of the Jewish government was in Yehuda, and more specifically, in Jerusalem. The destruction of the cities of Yehuda signifies the loss of Jewish dominion, the fall of the Jewish government. The destruction of Jerusalem signifies the fall of the seat of the government. Therefore, the rabbis instituted the kriah as a sign of mourning for the loss of Jewish dominion.

Today, we have dominion over the cities of Yehuda and we have the seat of government in Jerusalem. Therefore, these kriahs are no longer to be observed.

However, the destruction of the Temple has religious significance. It is the symbol of the distancing of the Shechina, the Divine Presence. We tear kriah as a sign of disappointment, of pain at the distance between man and the Shechina. This kriah is still required. We are mourning a spiritual state that still exists.

It is for this same reason that all the practices of mourning leading up to Tisha b'Av are still in effect. These mourning practices are for the destruction of Jerusalem in its spiritual aspects. We mourn for this destruction and pray for the rebuilding of the spiritual Jerusalem.

Rav Soloveitchik was vehemently against the suggestion made by Rav Goren to rewrite the prayer Nachem that we say on Tisha b'Av, to reflect that Jerusalem is rebuilt. The physical rebuilding of Jerusalem has happened and continues to happen. The spiritual rebuilding is taking a little longer to happen.

Let us hope and pray that we will contribute our part to spiritually rebuild Jerusalem.

Commemorating a painful past

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway, like Jewish history, does not always lead to pleasant destinations. But revisiting the bitter events of our past can teach us powerful lessons for today.

We are about to embark on a period which commemorates some of the most painful events in Jewish history. Starting with the 17th of Tamuz and culminating on the Ninth of Av, these three weeks recall the destruction of the First and Second Temples and many other persecutions of the Jewish people.

There are several very good sites which summarize the history of the "Three Weeks" such as [http://members.aol.com/jewfaq/holiday.htm] and [http://www.ort.org/links/benuri/tour_8.htm]. For a comprehensive look at the customs associated with this season and their origins, visit [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/fasts.htm]. And in Jerusalem in Jewish Consciousness [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/9avrka.html]. Dr. Dov Goldflam looks at how the loss of Jerusalem and its Temples have etched their way into the Jewish psyche.

Central to the observance of Tisha b'Av is the reading of Megillat Aichah (Book of Lamentations) which recalls the glory that was Jerusalem and the depths to which the city and its inhabitants have descended. If you have installed Hebrew fonts on your Internet browser, you can read Aichah in the original Hebrew at [http://www1.snunit.k12.il/kodesh/bible/maich.html]. The King James English translation of Aichah can be found at [http://www.spd.louisville.edu/~m0zaud01/holy/lam.txt].

It can be difficult to understand the impact events of long ago had on everyday life. The Jerusalem Mosaic [http://jeru.huji.ac.il/open_screen2.htm] tries to bring that history to life. Through photographs, maps and essays, the mosaic follows the history of Jerusalem from the First and Second Temple to the modern times. There are essays on personalities of the day, dress and even food during the First Temple Period [http://jeru.huji.ac.il/eb1s.htm].

Speaking of food, during the first nine days of Av, it is traditional to refrain from eating meat. If you are looking for a new yet ancient dairy meal, the Jerusalem Mosaic offers a recipe for a 2,500-year-old dish. Dating back to the First Temple, labaneh [http://jeru.huji.ac.il/eb42.htm] is made from sour milk and yogurt. According to the recipe, you can use regular milk in your labaneh but "it's worth making the effort to get sheep's milk."

There are several interesting sites which look at the events surrounding this period and offer some contemporary insights. In his article on the Forgotten Hero of Tisha b'Av Enabled Judaism to Survive [http://www.jewish.com/bk950804/comm2.htm] Rabbi Irving Greenberg tells the story of one of Judaism's great visionaries. It was Rabban Yochanan ben Zakkai who was able to secure Yavneh as the centre of Jewish life after the fall of Jerusalem. Rabbi Greenberg suggests that modern Jewish leadership could learn from ben Zakkai's model of combining both trust in G-d and personal initiative.

There is another potent lesson that can be learned 2,000 years after the fall of Jerusalem. In his Thoughts on Tisha b'Av [http://www.virtual.co.il/education/education/ohr/special/misc/tishabav.htm] Rabbi Yochanan Zweig tells the Talmudic story of the dispute between Kamtzah and Bar Kamtzah. According to tradition, the Second Temple was destroyed because of sinat hinam (pointless hatred among the Jewish people).

Rabbi Jerome Epstein echoes those feelings in Tisha b'Av Tragedy Should Exhort Community to Unite. [http://www.jewish.com/bk950804/comm1.htm]. He decries bickering among Jews who ultimately share a common goal and future. But he finishes on a positive note. "Tradition maintains that after grieving, we must renew our strength and continue our lives. The period of shiva is finite; we are not permitted to mourn forever. In this spirit, let us use the holiday of Tisha b'Av to strengthen both our commitment and our community so that we can lessen, if not totally eliminate, the need for future mourning."

Amen.

Romanian-born scholar Heger earns PhD at 72

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — His days of running a large business enterprise are behind him, but Paul Heger's work ethic and high standards are not. At 72, Heger has just received his PhD in Jewish history from the University of Toronto.

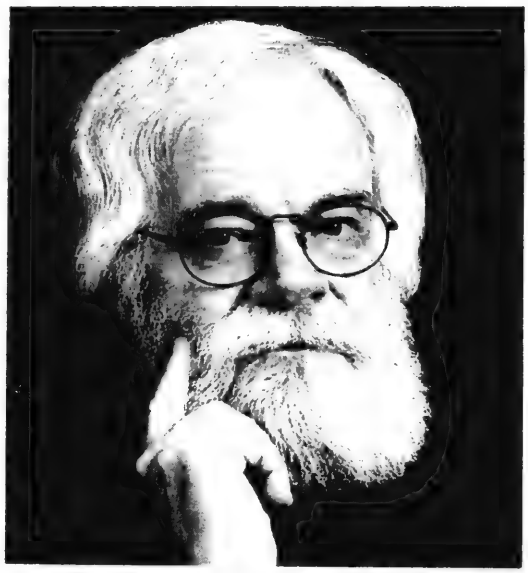
In the past 10 years, the Romanian-born scholar, who moved here from Israel with his wife in 1982, has acquired a BA in Near Eastern Studies and Religious Studies and another in Jewish Studies, an MA in Post-Biblical Literature, two scholarships, two Dean's Honor Roll listings and an academic award. His PhD thesis on The Development of the Incense Cult in Israel is being published by international academic publisher Walter de Gruyter.

"I enjoyed every minute of it," Heger says emphatically of his studies, although he admits there were obstacles along the way.

Despite his linguistic ability — he knows 10 languages and has an excellent command of English — he found the study of ancient Greek "boring and difficult, especially for a person [my] age, because it has to do very much with memory."

When it comes to issues, asking questions and making comparisons, however, he feels an older student "who has an interest" may do even better than a younger person.

For Heger, going back to school has been both satisfying and practical. "I know people who retire and don't find a place for themselves," he said.



Paul Heger

He is already at work on another scholarly paper, and reference books in German, French, Italian and English are piled beside his desk. He plans to continue to research and give lectures.

Leaving behind the photographic supply business started by his uncle and his father was an adjustment he likened to quitting smoking, which he did in 1960. "I don't miss it now," he says of the business.

Heger's intellectual curiosity was honed during his teenage years, when he studied at yeshivah for three years each in Eastern Europe and Jerusalem. With the help of his uncle in Palestine, Heger, his brother and his parents were able to leave Europe in 1940.

He had no formal business training when he joined the company in 1946, but his yeshivah background "didn't hamper me from being a successful businessman and leading negotiations with directors of big companies in Germany, Belgium, France and England." For 30 years, the company was the exclusive Israeli distributor for Agfa photographic products.

"I don't regret having learned in yeshivah," he says.

Today Heger is "far from Orthodox" but remains fascinated by the richness of Judaism.

"I think we need knowledge of our culture to be able to be proud of the values and the heritage. It's not just because we eat gefilte fish on Friday night. That's not enough to keep a people alive."

Heger is proud that the oldest of his four grandchildren, a 16-year-old boy, recently won a biblical essay contest in Israel. "I think and I hope that I have influenced them to study also, especially Jewish studies."

Ruth Rotman gets BA at age 76

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After a decade of part-time studies, both here and in Israel, Ruth Wolfish Rotman, 76, has graduated from the University of Toronto with a BA in Political Science and a minor in Judaic Studies.

"Canada's such a vibrant and wonderful country. To really understand the workings, you have got to study its government, its courts and its laws. You get all that with political science," she said in an interview at her sister's Toronto home. Among the subjects she studied in Israel were Hebrew language and Israeli politics, at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

"As far as Judaic studies, I think it's a natural," she said. Pursuing a degree was "strictly self-fulfilment."

A native of Toronto, Rotman attended Harbord Collegiate before going to work as a bookkeeper in 1942 for Royal Canadian Fuels. She worked her way up the ladder at the company, eventually becoming internal auditor for the group of companies acquired over the years.

Although she fully intended to continue devoting herself to work and community life (she is a past national president of Na'amat), she married — for the first time — in 1978 and moved to Israel with her husband Manny several months later.

Manny, her longtime boss, had been widowed in 1975. He was also active in the Toronto Jewish community and received a degree from U of T himself in 1985. His son Joseph, who took over his business on his retirement, hooded Ruth at her recent graduation.

A frequent visitor to Toronto after her move to Israel, Rotman would "squeeze in a subject" whenever they travelled here for a summer. Among her subjects were Gender and the Israeli Courts and a course on the history of battered Jewish women from biblical times to the present.

Ruth Rotman

"While I would always visit everyone once, I couldn't spend a lot of time [with family]. There was always an essay, an exam."

She has high praise for U of T's Woodsworth College for part-time students. "Only a small percentage of the population has the luxury to study full-time, and at Woodsworth you just study when you can."

Rotman found her younger classmates "kind, considerate and thoughtful" — there were always offers to pick up handouts for her if it meant going down the stairs of a large lecture hall.

It felt "absolutely great" to receive her BA. "Many times while I was studying the goal seemed so far away, and to finally grasp it was something special."

Other seniors considering university studies should go ahead, says Rotman. "It will keep them young."

Wong honored with Beth Sholom Humanitarian Award

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Dr. Joseph Y. K. Wong, a strong advocate for multiculturalism, was honored recently at Beth Sholom brotherhood's 45th annual Humanitarian Award dinner.

The more than 600 people attending reflected Wong's multicultural philosophy.

"This is not only my honor, but the honor of my people — the Chinese community," Wong told The CJN. "Working for the wider community enhances our sense of belonging."

Wong said he has worked with hundreds of thousands of volunteers, adding that "this event is a tribute to volunteerism."

The principal objective of the Beth Sholom brotherhood is "to foster better understanding among people of all races, colors and creeds who make up the mosaic of this great country," said Mendel Green, award ceremony chair.

In his presentation of the award, Green described Wong as "a great Canadian who has in his modest and quiet way accomplished more for all Canadians than anyone I know." He noted Wong's close connection with the Jewish community.

Born in Hong Kong, Wong came to Canada in 1968 at the age of 20 and graduated from McGill University as an engineer. He received a medical degree in 1976 from Yeshiva University's Albert Einstein College of Medicine in New York City.

Wong established a practice in downtown Toronto and became active at Mount Sinai Hospital, where he has been a director for many years. He is on the Board of Governors of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

His extensive volunteer activities could fill volumes. Ann Golden, president of the United Way of Greater Toronto praised Wong who served as chair of the United Way from 1990 to 1994.

She noted that to get the Chinese community involved in the United Way, Wong organized a walkathon with 400 participants. Today, more than 30,000 people participate in the walkathon, of which Wong was named honorary chair by the United Way.

Wong created the world's first registry of bone marrow donors. Using Baycrest as a model, he spearheaded the creation of the Yee Hong Centre for seniors in the Chinese community.

He was appointed by the federal government to help promote federalism in 1992 and received an honorary doctor of science degree from the University of Toronto that year. In 1993, he was made a member of the Order of Canada. The Canadian Council of Christians and Jews has presented him with their Human Relations Award.

In his acceptance speech, Wong expressed concern about the growing intolerance in Canada. In tough economic times, he said, Canadians find scapegoats in the new immigrant communities.

"We are a nation of immigrants who hate immigrants." Canada was built by waves of immigration — the nation owes its greatness to this diversity, he said.

Kolel program re-examines traditional hymn for women

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO – A lot of emotional baggage comes with Aishet Chayil, the traditional praise of women from the Book of Proverbs.

"Most of us are used to hearing the poem read at funerals, in praise of dead women," said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein. "And all they did was cook, clean and slave over their families."

A recent program, An Evening of Art and Learning, sponsored by Kolel: A Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning, offered a re-examination of the traditional hymn, which is also read on Shabbat and at weddings. Scholar and teacher, Rachael Turkienicz and Rabbi Goldstein engaged in an informal dialogue on a feminist analysis of the poem.

"We must meet the text with the possibility that it could speak to us," said Rabbi Goldstein.

Turkienicz agreed and encouraged readers to go beyond the surface meaning of the poem. She noted many women feel intimidated at trying to live up to the expectations described.

"She's a superwoman! She cooks, cleans, does business, learns Torah, and she never sleeps. When you find her, find me her number because I want to marry her," Turkienicz said.

She then went on to select from the midrash examples of righteous women: "Yael, Batsheva, Michal, Ruth ... these women were not perfect ... [but] we are not looking for the ideal, perfect woman."

Aishet Chayil, Turkienicz said, talks about the women we live with. "If we do what we're supposed to correctly, then she [the aishet chayil] can be found in any of our homes."

Rabbi Goldstein spoke of the poem's ability to capture all the characteristics of the woman. She explained that the hymn is divided into thirds.

"She is a wife and mother, businesswoman and spiritual entity ... two-thirds of this poem is about the independent woman, one-third about the woman in relationships."

In many ways, she said, Aishet Chayil is like a protest against the stereotypes society places on women. It resists focusing on a woman's sweetness, but instead stresses the fullness of woman and her spiritual substance.

The evening also included a viewing of the art exhibition Aishet Hayil in the Kanner Heritage Museum of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. Thirty-two artists from the United States and Israel were commisioned and asked to choose one line from Aishet Chayil and create an interpretive piece of art work.

The result is a colorful exhibit of 36 works, including ceramics, paintings, sculptures, needle work and clothing, by men and women of all ages, including the pencil and ink sketch of a 9-year-old artist.

The goal of the exhibit is to encourage viewers to see the poem in a new light. The diversity in the creative work displayed represents the many interpretations the poem lends itself to.

The Kanner Museum is the exhibit's only Canadian stop. It runs until Nov. 15 and there is no admission charge.

Mizrachi lets students learn about politics first hand

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like many yeshivah high school graduates, Hadassah Rais and Ari Feldman will be spending next year in Israel. But with a difference.

They are this year's Mizrachi of Canada political science interns, and, between classes in Torah and Jewish thought, will get hands-on experience in the workings of the Canadian and Israeli political systems.

The brunch also honored North York Ward 7 councillor Michael Feldman, Ontario Wilson Heights MPP Monte Kwinter and Willowdale MP Jim Peterson, who have agreed to work with the two youngsters in Canada.

In Israel, Rais and Feldman will work with NRP Knesset Member Zevulun Hammer, education, culture and arts minister in the Netanyahu government.

Kwinter told the audience of over 100 that he was "really delighted to participate" in the program, partly to counterbalance the fact that "politicians are held in some disdain. It is important for young people to get some idea of what politicians actually do."

Deborah Feldman, speaking on behalf of her father, said that Michael Feldman believes strongly that "it is important to make a contribution" to the society in which one lives.

Peterson was emotional after being introduced in glowing terms by former Canadian Jewish Congress president Les Scheininger as a good friend of the Jewish community, for whom "there is not a Jewish issue he hasn't been involved in."

Having met Rais and Feldman, Peterson said he was "touched by their enthusiasm."

Last year's interns, Daniella Robicsek and Ari Tanenbaum, were praised by Mizrachi executive director Rabbi Menachem Gopin for having "served with distinction on both sides of the Atlantic." They also worked with Hammer, as well as with Maurizio Bevilaqua in Ottawa and Vaughan councillor Bernie Green.

Both spoke of the excitement and satisfaction learning about and being involved in the day-to-day workings of government.

Lorne Alter, chair of the Mizrachi Political Science Internship Program, brought greetings, and Rabbi Raphael Marcus, spiritual leader of B'nai Torah Congregation, gave a d'var Torah.

Caring costs money

$60,000,000

To build the new Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged and The Centre for Cognitive Disorders, we need $60,000,000.

Yes, that's what it costs to build the new home - a place of safety for the aging in our community.
A place with special facilities for the fragile.

Thanks to many donors we're on our way.

But we are only half way there and we need your help to reach $60,000,000.

Help us be there when you need us!

1) בנושא הפלשתינאים סוכמו ע"י פרס רבין ועראפת הצעדים לעוד מספר שנים. ישראל יכולה תיאורטית להתכחש להסכמי אוסלו, אלא שנתנייהו ודויד לוי כבר הודיעו נחרצות שישראל מאמינה בכיבודם של הסכמים בינלאומיים.

2) למרות שחשבו שנתנייהו יבטל את פינוי חברון, חודשו המגעים להמשך תהליך פינוי צ"הל משם.

3) בנושא המו"מ עם סוריה - ציפו כולם שנתנייהו יסכים לחקיקת חוק נגד החזרת הגולן, כפי שדרשה מפלגת "החדרך השלישית" (שקמה רק על שאלה זו) , אך הפלא ופלא - נתניהו סירב לחתום על התחייבות כזו, והתנגדותו גרמה לזעזוע רציני במחנה הימין. הוא אמנם הסכים לכתוב שהוא מכיר בחשיבות הגולן, אך סירובו לחתום מראש על חוק שריון הגולן אומרת בפירוש שהנושא פתוח למשא ומתן בין ישראל וסוריה, וממילא מו"מ כזה אפשרי ורצוי. לסיכום - למרות שהנבואה ניתנה רק לשוטים, אני מעז להציע שנתנייהו חולך להיות פרגמטי מאוד, ושהאידיאולוגיה של הימין הולכת להיות ממש לא במרכז העניינים.

Wosk and family honored by Bonds

By MAURICE LUCOW
CJN Western Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Philanthropist Morris Wosk and his family were recently honored for their support of Israel over the years.

At a tribute dinner at the Hyatt Regency Hotel, organized by State of Israel Bonds, Vancouver Mayor Philip Owen officially proclaimed June 18 as Wosk Day.

The dinner also marked the 50th anniversary of Wosk's marriage to his wife, Dena.

The Wosks had just returned from Israel, where they were one of 24 leading world Jewish families honored for their contribution to the Jewish state.

At the Jerusalem 3000 tribute ceremony, a time capsule containing a genealogical record of each of the 24 families was buried at a specially prepared site behind the King David Hotel.

The other Canadians recognized were the George Cohon family of Toronto.

CNN interviewer Larry King opened the Vancouver tribute dinner wearing his trademark suspenders (he put his jacket on later), and bantered with Wosk.

Wosk, 78, a member of the Order of Canada and Order of British Columbia and who was awarded an honorary doctorate of laws degree by Simon Fraser University a few days before, has lived in Vancouver for 68 years.

In a message from the government of Israel, consul general Jehudi Kinar said, "We are extremely impressed by Mr. Wosk's goodness and generosity. It seems that anybody who asks his help never leaves empty handed. Morris Wosk is the personification of what is meant by tzedakah."

In addition to Larry King, speakers included Leon Kahn, Gordon Diamond, Dr. Al Bogoch, Senator Ray Perrault, Owen, World Bonds president Nathan Sharony and Rabbi Marvin Hier.

Moshe Safdie slams Israeli urbanization

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The rapid growth of Israel's population and economy has been accompanied by unchecked urbanization, with little regard for controlling congestion and preserving green space, internationally acclaimed architect Moshe Safdie said at a recent Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev dinner in his honor.

"In its first 48 years, Israel has had an enormous preoccupation with security, the absorption of immigrants and economic survival. It has made achievements in agriculture and forestration, but the urban environment has never been a priority," said Israeli-born Safdie.

With peace and increasing affluence, he said Israel must start addressing the problem over high-density population, too many cars and roads, and loss of open land, particularly that which is public.

The population of central Israel, between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem, is so dense that it constitutes one metropolitan area, he said. The population continues to concentrate between Haifa and Beersheva.

"Acres and acres of agricultural land is being converted to housing," he said. And in Jerusalem itself, the present administration is not continuing former longtime mayor Teddy Kollek's goal of preserving the ancient holy city's character with the same vigor.

"There are now 20 buildings over 20 stories high under development," he noted.

Over the past 15 years, car ownership has quadrupled and the highways are nearing gridlock, yet roads continue to be built rather than developing mass transit — with little thought to the environmental consequences, he said.

What green space remains is increasing in private hands, he said, while public parks and general infrastructure are "falling into disrepair."

Major investment is being made in projects like shopping centres, while housing deteriorates — a situation he attributes to rent control.

Safdie called for a public education campaign aimed at instilling a true love of the land. "Loving the land is not limited to simply settling the land, but keeping it beautiful."

About 300 people attended the dinner at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel, where Safdie was recognized as "one of the foremost architects and designers of this century," who never lost sight of human needs and the need to harmonize buildings with their surroundings.

The event was chaired by Jonathan Wener, chief executive officer of the Montreal-based real estate development firm Canderel.

Dinner proceeds will go toward the development of Rabin Park near the famous Burma Road in the Sha'ar Hagai Forests, which were devastated by fire last year.

Bomb linked to right-wing group

CHARLOTTETOWN — The Atlantic Jewish Council (AJC) is playing down last week's discovery of a pipe bomb that's been linked to a far-right fringe group.

The self-styled terrorist group calling itself Loki 7 is being investigated after the bomb exploded at a propane plant where the RCMP were trying to defuse it.

The bomb was found between empty propane tanks. No one was hurt and there was little damage.

The prior warning, sent to a CBC reporter, was on letterhead that had the words: "Loki 7 — The Final Solution" and a stylized swastika.

The group has claimed responsibility for two prior bombings in Charlottetown: one under a wheelchair ramp at the legislature in April 1995 and one in front of a courthouse in 1988.

City police said the latest bomb was more powerful than the two previous ones. An electronic detonator was wired to the explosive.

Police were quoted as saying they believe the author of the letter planted the bomb.

Jon Goldberg, AJC executive director, said he's not worried about the incident.

Goldberg said he spoke to a Halifax police source, who said the incident "is not a threat" to the Jewish community.

Goldberg said he's had no calls from any of Prince Edward Island's 25 Jewish families.

Meantime, Canadian Jewish Congress in Montreal said it was not responding to reports that a June 24 riot in Quebec City that caused some $2 million in damage was fomented by the Northern Hammerskins, a neo-Nazi group with chapters across North America.

Cellist Ofra Harnoy...

By LINDA ANDER
Special to The CJN

When Ofra Harnoy plays the cello, the notes soar into space like magic in the air. She has been called the Mario Lemieux of the music world.

Ofra was born in Hadera, Israel, on Jan. 31, 1965. Her parents Jacob and Carmen are both musicians. She has been told that hours before she was born, her parents were listening to Tchaikovsky's trio for piano, violin and cello. Since Jacob is an amateur violinist and Carmen plays and teaches piano, they dreamed of playing the trio. As Ofra grew up, their dream became a reality.

From infancy, Ofra loved to listen to music and when she was very young, her mother brought home a quarter-sized cello from the conservatory where she taught.

Ofra's first teacher was her father. She was so good at remembering the music that she only had to practise half an hour a day. Her father gave her difficult pieces to play, but did not tell her that most students would find them difficult. As a result, Ofra was never afraid of a musical challenge.

In 1971, the Harnoys moved to Toronto where Ofra went to a Jewish day school and continued to study music and play the cello.

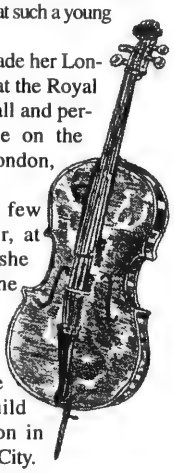
She was so talented that she was only 10 when she first soloed with an orchestra. Because Ofra was so young when she first started performing at concerts, her mother Carmen always went with her. Even today, although Ofra is famous, Carmen is involved in her daughter's life and takes responsibility for schedules and travel arrangements.

SIMON KIRSHEN BLAT

As part of her training, Ofra was given a special grant to spend three summers at a music camp in England where some of the greatest musicians were her teachers. They gave her advice about solving the difficulties in the pieces she played, but did not try to change her style.

Ofra was a guest soloist for the Montreal Symphony at age 13 and with the Toronto Symphony at 14. It is rare for a musician to solo with a major orchestra at such a young age.

Shortly after that, she made her London debut at the Royal Festival Hall and performed live on the radio in London, England.



Just a few weeks later, at 15, she became the youngest person ever to win the Artist Guild competition in New York City. As part of her prize, she appeared at Carnegie Hall. She has said that when she played at the famous hall, she first realized that she was doing exactly what she most wanted.

"At first I thought Carnegie was just a name," she writes. "But when I was there, I knew what it was.

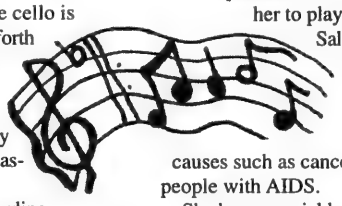
The big hall has so many ghosts, so much history to it. You feel special walking down the corridor so many have walked before."

When you speak to Ofra, it is clear that she is not conceited about the awards she has won or about the fact that she has never lost a competition that she entered.

Ofra's style of playing the cello is unique. She sways back and forth and the notes seem to flow from the strings. She expresses emotion through her music. She loves to play any kind of music from rock to classical.



She has made over 40 recording, many of which have beautiful album covers. She appreciates physical beauty and designs glamorous dresses for herself. But she does not want critics to focus on her looks. "Just because a woman doesn't look plain, the music is regarded with suspicion," she has said.

Ofra has toured in Europe, the Far East, North America and Australia. In Japan, she was asked to play privately with members of the royal family.

In September 1991, Prince Charles invited her to play for a concert to restore Salisbury Cathedral in England. Her performance helped raise millions of dollars.

Ofra supports other causes such as cancer research and helping people with AIDS.

She has a special love for Israel and spends time there whenever she can. She has opened the season for the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra. Her mother has said she is both sabra and Canadian.

Coburn Fellowships

OTTAWA — The Canada Council and Victoria University of the University of Toronto, recently announced that Anna Januszkiewicz and David Moscovitch are the recipients of the Canada Council Coburn Fellowships for 1996.

The $20,000 Coburn Fellowships are made possible by a bequest by Kathleen Coburn, who graduated in 1928 from Victoria University and taught there for many years. Her bequest established a fund to provide travelling fellowships to qualified students in Israel and Canada.

The fellowships are intended to cover expenses, accommodation and tuition at the University of Tel Aviv or the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for Canadians, and at the University of Toronto for Israeli students.

The fellowships were first awarded in 1995. Ron Borkovsky of Victoria University spent a year at Tel Aviv University, while Judith Sone of University College, Toronto, was enrolled at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Anna Januszkiewicz is a Victoria student enrolled in the specialist program in Christianity and Culture. After completing her undergraduate degree, she intends to begin a master's program in biblical, theological and historical studies at the Toronto School of Theology.

David Moscovitch is a University College student enrolled in major programs in psychology and Jewish studies. He hopes to gain a deeper understanding of contemporary Israel and intends to enrol in courses dealing with such topics as the foreign policy of Israel, Arab-Israeli relations and the evolution from Zionist idea to Israeli society.

He is very interested in the Arab-Israeli conflict and the ongoing peace process and wants to spend his year in Israel interacting with the people on the street to gain a better understanding of the country, its culture and its politics that so deeply affect his own life.

Januszkiewicz and Moscovitch will be leaving in early July for Israel, where they will attend Hebrew University.

Hamilton Negev Dinner honors Holocaust survivor

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — An unprecedented 1,000-plus guests attended the recent Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Tribute Dinner in honor of businessman Arthur Weisz, the first Holocaust survivor to be honored by the Hamilton community.

With 96 new projects pledged in a community the size of Hamilton, this Negev Dinner "had the most projects in the world" per capita, said Hamilton-based JNF Jerusalem emissary, Brig.-Gen. Dubi Dekel, quoting Keren Kayemeth officials in Jerusalem.

As honorary chair of the Yad Layeled project, a "museum and living educational complex in memory of the 1½ million children killed in the Holocaust," guest speaker Eli Wiesel, expressed his appreciation that proceeds from the dinner are designated for it.

The renowned author and Nobel Prize winner spoke about the importance of remembering, especially the Holocaust and the murdered children, and of not ignoring history.

"Jews have a special feeling for children," he said, "and throughout history our enemies knew this and always murdered the children first. Why couldn't our oppressors stand children?

"It always began with the children," he reiterated, "always the children!"

Other tributes came from federation president, Judge George Czutrin; national JNF president, Sid Halpern; and city officials. Local politicians brought greetings from the federal and provincial governments.

Former Negev Dinner honoree Sam Taylor made the official presentation and Broadview-Danforth MP Dennis Mills presented a flag from the Peace Tower in Ottawa on behalf of the Government of Canada.

Others taking part in the event at the Copps Coliseum were Rabbi Morton Green, Adas Israel; Rabbi Israel Silverman, Beth Jacob; Rabbi Irwin Zeplowitz, Temple Anshe Sholom; and Anshe Sholom rabbi emeritus, Rabbi Bernard Baskin. Marvin Rosenshein sang the anthems.

Hebrew University names student centre after Lougheed

By JUDY SHAPIRO
Jewish Free Press

CALGARY — Future generations of overseas students at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem will come to know the name of Peter Lougheed and to recognize the former premier's well-established link to the province of Alberta.

One of the four main halls in Canada House, a new overseas student centre at the university, will be named the Honorable E. Peter Lougheed Alberta Hall.

When the proposal for the new Canada House was announced, local Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University chapter president Karen Behar said that Lougheed immediately came to mind.

"In a lot of our minds, he's Mr. Canada," said Behar.

"His interest in national unity, his support for Canadian universities, his strong interest in education," all made Lougheed an ideal candidate for the honor, Behar said.

Home to 4,300 students from 60 countries, the Rothberg School for Overseas Students has experienced unprecedented growth. Canada House is being built to solve the serious problem of overcrowding in the existing facility.

Each province will have a prominent place within the building and the Alberta Hall will be first to be dedicated.

"This means that the most prominent institution on campus for students from throughout the world will be identified with our country," said Canadian Friends' executive director in Calgary, Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum.

"Per capita, Canadian Friends is the highest contributor to the Hebrew University in the world," Behar said. "So it is fitting that the new overseas student centre be called Canada House."

In developing an event where the Hebrew University's Scopus Award will be presented to Lougheed, organizers sought to link two of the former premier's primary interests — education and national unity.

Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University is, therefore, organizing a national unity forum to be held Aug. 21, which will bring together a panel of prominent Canadians to address, from a western perspective, the issues surrounding Canada's future.

Chairing the day-long event will be Jeff Lipton, president of NOVA corp. Prof. David Taras of the University of Calgary will chair the unity forum.

From the Canadian Friends' point of view, the national unity forum fulfils its mandate to provide educational opportunities in Calgary.

"One of our primary objectives is assisting in the education of our own community. The national unity forum is another opportunity, like the Peace Ambassadors' Forum last year, to bring education to the community," Behar said.

Yoga helps to cope with hurly-burly of modern life

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Forget those stereotypes about yoga you've heard in the past. You don't have to contort yourself into a human pretzel to enjoy the therapeutic benefits offered by this ancient Eastern spiritual and physical discipline.

Instead, by practising a variety of poses, training your body to stretch and doing breathing exercises you can give yourself a sense of well-being and an inward focus that helps in coping with the hurly-burly of modern life.

That's part of the message contained in a new how-to book by Toronto yoga maven Esther Myers. A longstanding instructor on the Toronto yoga scene, Myers is the author of Yoga & You, Energizing and Relaxing Yoga for New and Experienced Students (Random House, $22).

The softcover book explores the different forms of yoga while tracing its origins to its roots in Indian philosophy. But for those more interested in stretching than spirituality, the book is replete with easy to follow instructions accompanied by illustrations on how to perform the various exercises and postures that are emphasized in hatha yoga, its physical brand.

Myers, 49, believes yoga is growing in popularity as part of a shift away from high impact, high-injury exercises to low impact, low-injury activities.

One of the reasons for the surge in yoga's popularity is its applicability for today's stressed-out working person caught in the rat race. It's an excellent way to slow down, find inner spiritual peace and relax the body and mind, Myers said.

"It's about concentration and inward focus. If you focus on breathing [and exercises] then your physiology and state of mind will be affected," she explained.

It's widely accepted these days that the immune system is affected by stress. So anything you can do to reduce tension has a beneficial effect on your health, she said.

It's also useful in helping people cope with chronic pain and recover from surgery. Yoga had that effect on her a few years ago after she was diagnosed with breast cancer.

"I was shocked at the diagnosis. How could it happen? I was doing all the right things," she said.

Unfortunately, her mother had died of breast cancer and Myers came to realize the preponderant role of genetics in her case. Myers underwent a mastectomy and found that yoga "was an incredible resource. It's like you're drowning and someone throws you a life preserver."

A yoga instructor with 20 years experience, Myers has seen a jump in the number of people trying it recently, including a growing number of men.

Associated in the popular media with the 1960s counterculture, yoga is "hot now ... It had a weird, flaky connection that seems to be dissolving. [Pop singer] Sting does yoga. Ali MacGraw and Jane Fonda both made videos," she said.

At her Annex-area studio, Myers stresses breathing exercises and flexibility. She tailors exercises for individuals' body types, injuries and abilities.

"The purpose of the poses is to heal, to allow people to move more easily, to breath more easily," she said.

Esther Myers

Yoga is infinitely adaptable, she continued. Her studio alone offers a pre-natal class, a class for family and teens and a program for sufferers of multiple sclerosis.

You're never too old to take up yoga, she said, pointing to an instructor and a student at her studio who are both over 80 and who didn't take up yoga until they were in their 50s.

Myers' interest in yoga began when she was still in her 20s. An alumnus of Associated Hebrew Schools who had been active in USY and Hillel, Myers was working in London, England, when she first got interested in yoga and Tai Chi.

She returned to Toronto in 1975 and began to teach.

Myers believes that yoga, though it comes with its own spiritual baggage, is fully compatible with Judaism. For example, on Yom Kippur Jews focus inward and contemplate foregiveness, repentance and compassion, all of which are encouraged by yoga, she said.

Even the liturgy recited on Yom Kippur has a relevance to yoga. Sins are expressed in physical terms — a stiff neck, for example — while righteous people are "upright." Yoga teaches there is a connection between physicality and a person's ethical or "upright" behavior, she said.

Yoga's stress on meditation is paralleled in the kabbalist strain of Judaism and the rest from work required on Shabbat is reflected in yoga, which calls for stopping normal daily routines, focusing inward and contemplating holiness and spirituality, she said.

Low fat eggs on sale

JERUSALEM – A special diet for chickens, which results in the laying of cholesterol-friendly eggs, has recently been introduced into Israeli chicken runs.

Fed a special recipe of canola, soya, and other grains, chickens are producing eggs with 19 times the amount of Omega 3, a beneficial fatty acid, as conventional eggs.

"Beitzim Plus" eggs are now available in Israeli supermarkets.

Kupat Holim Friends plans fundraiser for cancer wing

TORONTO —Canadian Friends of Kupat Holim are holding a fundraising brunch to raise money for the upgrading of the cancer wing of Meir Hospital in Kfar Saba, just outside Tel Aviv.

Keynote speaker will be Josef Krystal, chair of Kupat Holim.

The current oncology treatment facility is a windowless room in the basement of the hospital. Plans are to enlarge and redo the oncology wing, and to move the treatment room to a bright area on the main floor.

The Toronto branch of Canadian Friends of Kupat Holim has previously been involved with building a cardiology wing at the Meir hospital, as well as with projects in Beersheva.

Three Israeli soldiers killed in ambush

Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Three soldiers were killed and two wounded when gunmen ambushed an IDF patrol near the Jordan River last week.

At press time, the attackers were still at large after fleeing into Jordan, despite a joint Jordanian-Israeli effort to catch them.

Military sources said the attack was well planned and caught the patrol completely by surprise during a routine sweep of the security road near Moshav Na'aran, north of Jericho.

There were five soldiers in the ambushed unit, three on foot and two in a command car equipped with a machine gun. The three foot soldiers were killed, and one in the command car was wounded. A soldier in a second patrol that arrived shortly after the attack began was also wounded.

The infiltrators apparently got away unharmed, although there was an exchange of fire.

Dead are Sgt. Ashraf Shibli, 20, from the village of Shibli, and Staff Sgt. (res.) Asher Bardugo, 22, of Kiryat Bialik, who were killed immediately.

Ya'acov Turgeman, 33, of Rishon LeZion, was badly wounded, but managed to get away, only to die several dozen metres from the scene of the attack.

The army spokesperson denied reports that the gunmen had tried to kidnap Turgeman.

According to an Associated Press report, a Damascus-based splinter group of the PLO's mainstream Fatah faction has claimed responsibility for the killings, saying the attack was intended to protest peace accords signed between the PLO and Israel.

The splinter group is reportedly led by Col. Mohammed Saeed Moussa, also known by his code name Abu Moussa.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said there was no concrete information as to who was behind the ambush, but added that Syria and Iran were known to have had a hand in such attacks. He vowed that Israel would act with the government of Jordan to prevent similar attacks in the future.

King Hussein called Netanyahu to express his condolences, and promised his country's help in preventing future infiltrations.

Joint seaches for the infiltrators were conducted by Jordan and Israel, in an operation that had an Israeli air force helicopter flying over Jordanian air space and permitted an IDF unit to cross the border into Jordanian territory, military sources said.

The searches were part of a closely coordinated effort that has existed along the Jordanian-Israeli border for the last 18 months.

King Hussein said there are those out to undermine the peace between Israel and Jordan – an apparent allusion to Syria, Israel Radio reported.

Military sources described the gunmen as well trained, and said they were clearly not on a suicide mission. The sources noted that they didn't flee immediately, but lingered to take the dead soldiers' weapons.

Initially, the army did not rule out the possibility that the terrorists remained in Israeli territory, and dozens of troops were rushed to the scene.

But it soon became apparent that the gunmen had fled into Jordan, and the IDF was left with little to do but wait for updates from the Jordanian army on the search being carried out east of the Jordan River.

Eitan, Segev to be indicted

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Attorney General Michael Ben-Yair has decided to indict both Agriculture Minister Rafael Eitan and former energy minister Gonen Segev, his office announced last Thursday.

The draft indictment accuses the two, as well as two other Tsomet activists, of violating the Privacy Protection Law by illegally extracting from the IDF computer confidential documents relating to another Tsomet activist, and making improper use of this material to threaten the activist into leaving the party.

However, Ben-Yair decided not to charge Eitan with extortion, which the police had reportedly recommended. The State Attorney's Office apparently decided that this charge would be too difficult to prove, both factually and in terms of criminal intent.

Responding to the announcement, Eitan said: "I'm not surprised, since I knew from the beginning that this was a wicked persecution over nothing."

Ben-Yair also decided, due to lack of evidence, to close the case against Tsomet MK Eliezer Zandberg, who had been investigated along with the others.

If he wishes, Eitan can request a hearing with Ben-Yair, at which he can try to persuade the attorney general that the charges against him are baseless. If Eitan waives this right, or if he does not manage to convince Ben-Yair, the latter will then have to ask the Knesset to lift his immunity.

The indictment is unlikely to affect Eitan's ability to serve as a minister, however, since Ben-Yair has already said this charge is not serious enough to disqualify him from a seat in the cabinet. Had Ben-Yair decided to charge Eitan with extortion – a much more serious charge than violations of privacy – Eitan might have been forced to resign his cabinet post.

Iran warns Israel against air attack from Turkey

By Jerusalem Post Staff

JERUSALEM – Iran has warned Israel against using a military accord with Turkey to strike at Teheran, saying it would retaliate if attacked, a newspaper reported last week.

"It is not believed that Turkey poses a threat against us, but we are watching our enemies' slightest moves and will use our retaliatory capacities if necessary," air force deputy commander Gen. Shahram Rostami was quoted by the daily Iran as saying.

Rostami was commenting on the military cooperation agreement concluded between Turkey and Israel in February, which allows each country to use the other's airspace for pilot training.

Iranian newspapers have carried Western press reports in which some Israeli officials have suggested the possibility of an air strike against Iran's nuclear sites.

Rostami said Iran's air force would stage major war games to display its power and evaluate its combat readiness.

Western military experts have said Teheran has tried to develop a long-range strike force by acquiring Russian-built Sukhoi Su-24 fighter planes in a program to overhaul its air force after the end of the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq war.

Meanwhile, Jordan's air force commander, speaking as U.S. air crews ended a training mission, said in Azraq that he looked forward to the day when Jordan would be able to hold joint exercises with the Turkish and Israeli air forces.

Gen. Mohammed Ababneh told a news conference at the base in Jordan where American forces were just ending a three-month mission that joint training with Turkey was possible once the two countries agreed they would both benefit.

He said joint air exercises with Israel would depend on progress in the peace process, but he favored the idea.

It was also announced at the press conference that the F-16 jets Jordan purchased from the United States will not be improved by Israel Aircraft Industries and then sent to Jordan as originally planned. Instead, they will be improved in the United States.

Clinton honeymoon may not endure

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

The late Yitzhak Rabin put it best. "Israel," he said, "has a good friend in the White House."

Mideast Analysis

Three years into his term, President Bill Clinton has proven to be the most pro-Israel president in American history.

Clinton's warm regard for Israel will doubtless manifest itself when Benjamin Netanyahu, the freshly-minted Israeli prime minister, visits the White House on July 9.

True, Clinton backed Shimon Peres, the Labor party leader, in Israel's general election. But once it was clear that Netanyahu had won, the Clinton administration closed ranks behind the winner, while Secretary of State Warren Christopher — who visited Jerusalem last week — pointedly said that the bonds between Israel and the United States are "enduring and unshakable."

Despite some nasty bumps, Israel's relationship with the United States has usually been close. Today, in Netanyahu's words, it is as "solid as a rock." Israel, to the United States, is a strategic asset and a reliable ally.

But there have been times when the bond has been frayed. During the early 1990s, when Israel was administered by a Likud government under Yitzhak Shamir, the two countries clashed acrimoniously over U.S. loan guarantees and Israeli settlements across the Green Line.

However, when the Labor party bounced back into power after the 1992 election and Rabin announced a more flexible policy, the chill in Israel's bilateral ties with the United States vanished.

Since the Clinton era, relations have never been better. Until the May 29 election, Israel had a government which embraced territorial compromise, a position advocated by the United States since the Six Day War. And in sharp contrast to Shamir's distrust of George Bush, Clinton and Rabin, and later Clinton and Peres, got on exceedingly well.

Like his predecessors, Clinton has championed the peace process to the hilt, having encouraged Israel to sign historic agreements with the PLO and Jordan and having tried to bring Syria into the circle of peace.

On a bilateral level, Clinton, who reportedly received 60 percent of his campaign funds from Jews in the 1992 presidential election, has displayed remarkable sensitivity to Israel.

While previous U.S. administrations called Israeli settlements in the territories "illegal" and "obstacles to peace," Clinton went no further than characterizing them as a "complicating factor."

When Israel deported 415 Palestinian Islamic fundamentalists to southern Lebanon, the United States successfully opposed efforts by the United Nations to condemn Israel.

The United States also vetoed a United Nations resolution denouncing an Israeli plan to confiscate land in East Jerusalem. Clinton supports Israel's claim to Jerusalem and believes that the U.S. embassy should be located there once Israel and the Arabs settle their differences.

Much to the chagrin of one of its chief Arab allies, Egypt, the United States supported Israel's refusal to endorse an international pact to halt the spread of nuclear weapons. (Israel claims it it will affix its signature to the Non-Proliferation Treaty only after threats to its existence are eliminated).

Clinton — the first sitting president to address the American Israel Public Affairs Committee, a pro-Zionist lobbying group — has consistently endorsed high levels of aid to Israel.

In this fiscal year, Israel will receive $3 billion (US) worth of military and economic assistance. (Together, Israel and Egypt consume more than 45 percent of the total U.S. foreign aid package).

In addition, the Clinton administration has earmarked an extra $200 million for the development of the Arrow, an anti-missile system being jointly developed by Israel and the United States.

Last March, following the four closely-bunched suicide bombings which killed 59 civilians in Israel, Clinton pledged $100 million for an anti-terrorism initiative. And after attending a hastily-convened meeting in Sinai to combat terrorism, Clinton, a yarmulke on his head, won the hearts of Israelis by placing a stone on Rabin's grave and by visiting the graves of Israeli soldiers who had fallen in battle.

Furthermore, Clinton has turned a blind eye to Israel's closure of the territories and, during Operation Grapes of Wrath, made a point of absolving Israel of any blame for the accidental shelling of a United Nations compound in Lebanon.

Clinton's pro-Israel stance has been unpopular with Americans who contend that the United States is compromising its traditional role as an honest broker in the Middle East by being too closely identified with Israel.

For now, Clinton can shrug off their criticism. But if the new Israeli government rejects the pivotal concept of trading land for peace and freezes the Oslo peace process, Israel's current honeymoon with the United States may not last too much longer.

Hijack survivor had been resigned to death

The word "unreal" is much used today, yet I cannot think of another word to describe my feelings at the time and the situation in which my mother and I found ourselves. I also felt a strange detachment and almost resignation in the face of possible death, since our greatest fear was that of being blown up in the sky. After our predicament had sunk in, I felt another emotion – anger, anger at these people who would ultimately decide our fate.

After 26 hours in the air, we got permission to land at Ben Gazi Airport in Libya. A collective shudder went through the plane – Muammar Khadafi! I remember two things from our brief stay on the tarmac: being given a meal of elephant meat, and my legs swelling to twice their size from sitting in one position for so long.

We were once again airborne and after several hours, a further announcement: We would be landing in Uganda. Another shudder – Idi Amin.

I should mention that the German man was the one one who was most in control of his emotions and the German woman the least. He was obviously the leader of the group in the air and spoke in calm, measured tones, unlike his hysterical compatriot. I was amazed to later hear this same calm, almost soothing manner being used in the middle of the night, with an elderly woman who was apparently suffering from Holocaust remembrances.

Tamara Elagin

There were buses waiting on the tarmac at the new Entebbe airport to take us to the old airport. I remember that as we were lining up to disembark, I saw the German hijacker standing just inside the plane at the head of the stairs, pleasantly smiling and nodding to each of the passengers. In fact, the woman ahead of me even shook his hand – an action which to me seemed surreal – as if bidding adieu to an attentive steward and thanking him for the wonderful flight!

We arrived at the large building (just one big hall, really) where some of us were to spend the next three days. I remember one Israeli woman seated next to us saying that Israel would never give in to the terrorists' demands, thus implying that we were doomed. (Tragically, this woman's husband would be one of the casualties of the raid by the Israelis on July 4.)

I recall a number of images, impressions, events, but not the order in which they happened: the gentle French captain sweeping the floor and the French crew acting in such a way as to reinforce their solidarity with us; a young French girl screaming as she was repeatedly slapped by the German woman; Merv Griffin's producer (a fellow passenger); the last day sleeping on mattresses bearing the label "Made in Canada;" being attended to by Ugandan waiters from the nearby new airport and being given meals of, initially, some sort of stew, rice and chunks of pineapple, meals which were gradually reduced to a diet of rice and bananas.

And most ominous of all, I remember the separation of the Israeli passengers. I was later told by a young Jordanian passenger seated near us that he heard there was some question of whether I was to be held with the Israelis, since my Australian passport bore an Israeli temporary resident stamp from the time when I had been there in 1969.

Apparently, the terrorists were looking for people who had been in Israel during the wars of 1967 and 1973. I don't think they quite knew what to make of me. I was born in Gibraltar, had a Russian name and held an Australian passport with Canadian landed immigration status and an Israeli temporary resident stamp.

I would like to recount one incident involving my dear mother, who passed away in 1994. While we were all trying to sleep the night after the separation of the Israeli passengers, I saw my mother stir beside me, get up and go to the back of the hall where one of the terrorists was keeping watch. What the devil was she doing? I thought, has she gone mad? At times like these, one tries to be inconspicuous.

I watched in awe (and with some annoyance) as she approached the terrorist and started talking to him. When she returned, she explained that she was feeling chilly, couldn't sleep and had decided to look for a blanket, which the tall terrorist gave her. Such chutzpah! But she also told me she could see into the adjoining room where the Israelis were kept. All the lights were blazing so that no one could get a decent night's rest, unlike in our part of the hall which was dark.

During our stay in Entebbe, Amin came to visit us four times, the first time accompanied by his wife and 4-year-old son decked out in fatigues. Of course, Amin was in full military regalia, complete with all the requisite rows of medals. I remember he said shalom to us and showed us his Israeli paratrooper wings.

A hopeful sign came on the day it was announced that a certain number of mothers and their children would be released. Surely our time would come soon. And it did.

On July 1, 1976, all the non-Israeli passengers were released including my mother and myself. We were transported by bus to the new Entebbe airport where our Air France jet was waiting to take us to Paris. Our original French crew did not join us, as they refused to leave their Israeli passengers and stayed behind with them.

I learned of the Israeli raid later in Paris and felt a little wistful (if that's the right word) that I wasn't there to experience the incredulous outcome and joyous homecoming in Tel Aviv.

Four years later, in 1980, while I was a volunteer on a kibbutz near Netanya, I was to meet, quite by accident, one of the commandos who took part in the raid on Entebbe.

And, of course, on this 20th anniversary, the brother of the hero of the raid on Entebbe is the current prime minister of Israel.

Pope honors Nazis' opponents

By DANIEL DAGAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BONN – Pope John Paul II told German Jewish leaders last week that too few Roman Catholics had resisted the Nazi regime.

Making his first visit to Germany since reunification, the pope met in Berlin with members of the Central Council of Jews in Germany after he beatified two German priests who perished during World War II while opposing the Nazis.

"Not enough of the faithful followed the example of the courageous ones" who dared oppose the Nazi regime, the pope told the Jewish leaders.

"Although many priests and lay people opposed this [Nazi] regime of terror, as historians have now shown, and many forms of resistance arose in people's daily lives, they were still too few," he said, according to the official text.

Ignatz Bubis, chair of the German Jewish council, praised the 76-year-old pope for speaking out against anti-Semitism and for trying to strengthen Catholic-Jewish relations.

Bubis added the Jews were aware that during the Nazi era, thousands of priests did resist and suffered severely as a result.

However, both the pope and the Jewish leaders skirted the controversial role of Pope Pius XII, who is widely accused of having been silent while six million Jews perished.

Instead, Jewish participants in the meeting stressed the need to educate people about the horrors of the past and the example set by the few who resisted the Nazis.

During his visit, the pope himself appeared to want to avoid controversy with Jews and other critics of the church's role during the Holocaust by digressing on more than one occasion from his prepared remarks.

At the open air mass held in Berlin's Olympic Stadium, attended by some 120,000 people, the pope did not read several passages in the prepared text.

One of the omitted sections said, "Those who don't limit themselves to cheap polemics know very well what Pius XII thought about the Nazi regime and how much he did to help the countless victims persecuted by that regime."

When he celebrated mass in the town of Paderborn, the pope omitted a passage from his prepared statement that said, "The whole church" had put up resistance against the Nazis.

Such remarks were in contrast to a statement made by German bishops last year lamenting the "profound failure" of Catholics to oppose anti-Semitism during the Nazi era.

Asked to comment on the omissions, Bishop Karl Lehmann, head of the German bishop's conference, played down the issue.

"It really was a question of time," Bishop Lehmann said. "It was just a coincidence that these particular passages were left out."

But according to Vatican officials, the written version of the pope's remarks remains the official record.

At the Olympic Stadium, the site of the 1936 games where Hitler had tried to project the image of a racially superior Nazi Germany that also was open and tolerant, the pope beatified two German priests who died during World War II while defying Hitler.

One of the priests was the Rev. Bernhard Lichtenberg, who condemned the Nazis' treatment of Jews from his pulpit and died in transit to Dachau.

The other was the Rev. Karl Leisner, who was sent to a concentration camp because he was overheard expressing regret that Hitler had not been assassinated.

Will Diaspora/Israel gap widen?

BY GARY ROSENBLATT

One can almost hear the changing of the guard in the American Jewish community as a new government is formed in Israel. Who's in? Who's out? And who cares? These are the critical questions posed after an election that is certain to change the landscape of Israel-Diaspora relations, and where there are a number of danger signals.

Opinion

Non-Orthodox Jews, who represent the overwhelming majority of American Jewry, are worried about the increased political power of the religious parties in Israel. Specifically, they are concerned about religious pluralism and whether future legislation regarding non-Orthodox conversions will make them feel like second-class Jews in the Jewish state. It is an emotional rather than a practical concern, but it resonates deeply with many American Jews.

In addition, Jews on the political left, who until recently represented the view of the Israeli government, are now the opposition. Groups like American Friends of Peace Now and the Israel Policy Forum now see their role as watchdogs, monitoring the Netanyahu government and trying to ensure that it keeps the flame of Arab-Israeli negotiating progress burning. They may be in for a frustrating time.

What would be a shame, and unfair, is if Jewish doves are again characterized as anti-Israel if they oppose the policies of the new government regarding such delicate issues as the expansion of settlements, working closely with the Palestinian Authority and negotiating with Syria.

Whatever our own political views, we need to distinguish between the phrases "anti-Israel" and "anti-government" and not repeat the ugly mistakes of the past.

On the other side of the spectrum, groups like the Zionist Organization of America, which steadfastly focused on the Palestinian Authority's peace treaty violations, and the National Council of Young Israel, which championed the cause of Jewish settlers, are feeling vindicated by the Netanyahu victory.

But they may find the new prime minister focusing his attention on mainstream groups like AIPAC (the American Israel Public Affairs Committee) and the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, whose roles will become more important as tensions between Jerusalem and Washington increase, as they are almost certain to do.

The majority of American Jews have said in various polls these last several years that they support the peace process of the Rabin-Peres government. Will they now shift gears and support the more hardline policies of Benjamin Netanyahu, since it is, after all, the government of Israel, or will they remain loyal to the more dovish policies of the previous government?

Perhaps most significantly, will increasing numbers of American Jews feel so alienated by the political and religious policies of the new Israeli government that fundraising for Israel, already on the decline, will be further impeded? Whether or not they admit it, our mainstream Jewish communal and philanthropic organizations are seriously concerned about this possibility.

Netanyahu, who prides himself on his ties to and understanding of American Jewry, seems aware of the potential problems ahead. His confidante, Zalman Shoval, the former ambassador to the United States under Likud, has made a point in recent days of emphasizing the importance of Israeli and American Jewish relations.

In a meeting with American Jewish leaders recently in New York, Shoval asserted that "nothing is more important today than Jewish unity."

Addressing the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, he reiterated several points he had expressed before. Most notably, he described the Israeli-American Jewish relationship as having "seriously eroded" over the last four years and proposed an emergency meeting of Diaspora Jews in Israel to deal with these issues.

Such a meeting could be a positive and symbolic step in highlighting the importance Israel places on American Jewry. Just raising the issues, though, is not enough. A similar meeting convened by Israeli President Ezer Weizman several years ago only seemed to underscore and deepen the rift. Many blamed Weizman, who equated Zionism with aliyah and had little patience for those who spoke of the importance of Diaspora Jewry.

What is needed instead of lecturing by Israeli officials is a genuine dialogue that allows both sides to explore a new and more meaningful relationship. The philanthropic role that American Jews have played for decades is less important now that Israel's economy has grown. Smoothing the way for more business investments in Israel and partnerships between American and Israeli Jews would be most constructive.

In terms of instilling a love of Jewish history, heritage and observance in young people, Israeli and American Jews need to work more closely together, because neither side has been successful alone and the clock is ticking.

The sad truth is that almost 50 years after statehood, Israeli officials can no longer take gut-level American Jewish support for granted, particularly as a government takes power that is reliant on Orthodox religious parties and appears to be more removed from the liberal Western values embraced by most American Jews. That perception may not be true, or it may indeed be true and need to be explored and explained. In either case, it needs to be addressed.

Any relationship worth saving requires caring, understanding and commitment from both sides. The sooner the Netanyahu government moves to bridge the gap between Israeli and American Jews, the better.

FOLK CHOIRS & AUCTIONS

Folk Choir Going Strong: To mark its 70th anniversary, the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir has released a 32-minute video, Keeping the Flame Alive: The Story of the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir traces the choir's growth from the day it was founded by immigrant needle trade workers on D'Arcy Street near Spadina.

The choir's glory days were evidently in the 1940s and 1950s, when it hosted renowned guest artists like Jan Peerce, Regina Resnick and Paul Robeson.

The video focuses on more recent triumphs, however, such as the choir's 1993 premiere of Milton Barnes' Fantasy on Jewish Themes, performed with the Flying Bulgar Klezmer band, with the Toronto-based composer conducting.

Last month, several choir members were honored for singing with the ensemble for 50 years or more. They are: Brina Harris, Rae Orlan, Molly Myers, Toby Kelson and Brenda Fishauf.

Auction of Confiscated Art: In a historic move that marks a step towards restitution for artwork confiscated by the Nazis, the auction house Christie's, acting on behalf of the Federation of Austrian Jewish Communities, auctions more than 1,000 art works in Vienna Oct. 29 and 30. Most of the art was seized from Jewish homes between 1938 and 1945. Proceeds are to be distributed to Jewish and non-Jewish victims of the Holocaust and their families.

After the war, the United States recovered thousands of pieces of confiscated art and turned them over to the Austrian government with the proviso that every effort be made to trace the owners; some 10,000 objects were identified and returned to family members. For more than 40 years, the unclaimed art was stored in a medieval monastery in Mauerbach, a town about 50 kilometres outside Vienna.

The sale, which Christie's has volunteered to conduct on a non-profit basis, is expected to raise more than $3.5 million. Property includes 19th-century paintings, Old Master paintings and drawings, and carpets, tapestries, furniture, arms and armor, coins and literature.

The Mauerbach auction takes place at Vienna's MAK Museum, the Austrian Museum of Applied Art. Public viewing begins Oct. 22. To reserve a cataogue, phone 800-395-6300.

More Auction News: Letters, military plans, photographs and the Bible belonging to Major-General Orde Wingate, one of the most legendary and controversial military heroes of World War II, are to be sold by Sotheby's London on July 11.

Wingate's campaigns turned the tide of the war in Africa and the Far East, and he played an integral role as the founding father of the Israeli military.

His papers are being sold in seven lots comprising the main Wingate archive; the archive relating to Palestine; Wingate's Bible; seven letters from Chaim Weizmann; three letters from Weizmann to Lewis Namier; two letters from Winston Churchill. Together, they are expected to raise about $ 200,000.

A world auction record was set by Sotheby's last April when Wingate's gallantry medals sold for about $ 113,000. Sotheby's site on the Worldwide Web is http://www.sothebys.com.

Survivor Literature: Strange and Unexpected Love: A Teenage Girl's Holocaust Memoirs, by Fanya Gottesfeld Heller, was the topic of a recent two-day international conference at Ben-Gurion University in Beersheva, Israel. The conference was titled Belated or Timely Memories: The Last Phase of Survivor Literature, and attracted leading scholars worldwide in the field of Holocaust literature.

Dr. Karin Doerr of Concordia University was apparently the only Canadian delegate.

Outdoor Art Exhibition: Nathan Phillips Square, in front of Toronto City Hall, is the setting for the city's 35th annual Outdoor Art Exhibition, involving some 540 art displays, Friday July 12 to Sunday July 14, 10 a.m. to 7 p.m. daily, rain or shine.

Admission for an art auction and party on July 12 is $35. Admission to the exhibition is free. Organizers plan to award more than $18,000 in prizes to artists, who are given a rare opportunity to sell their wares to the public. 416-408-2754.

Forbidden Hollywood perfect vehicle for Toronto actress

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

Lizzie Kurtz

TORONTO — If you had asked Lizzie Kurtz when she was five years old what she wanted to be when she grew up, her answer would have been immediate — a stage actress.

Nineteen years later, her ambition still strong, Kurtz is the female understudy in Gerard Alessandrini's Forbidden Hollywood, a musical comedy running indefinitely at the Atlantis Theatre in Ontario Place.

The fast-paced, upbeat show takes the audience on a comedy tour of Hollywood, including a hilarious parody of The Sound of Music. It is a perfect vehicle for Kurtz's ambitions as a performer.

Kurtz, who grew up in Toronto, says that from the time she was a young child and was upset at not being invited to be part of a children's concert, she knew that one day she would be on the stage.

"I was single-minded. I auditioned for Claude Watson School of the Arts four times until I was admitted. It didn't matter that they kept rejecting me. I kept on applying because I knew that is where I should be and I finally got in as a dance major."

She recently graduated from Sheridan College's musical theatre program where she appeared in such productions as Top Girls, Little Shop of Horrors, Cabaret and A Midsummer Night's Dream. She also sang in the Beth Tzedec choir and in the chorus of Toronto Operetta Theatre's Die Fledermaus at St. Lawrence Centre.

Her heart is in live theatre, Kurtz says, because of the immediate satisfaction she gets from acting in front of an audience.

"When I am on stage, the audience experiences what I am doing with me. If an audience sees an incredible performance, they know it and the performer knows it. It is no longer acting but rather, it is the truth, and the truth exists here and now.

"It is a similar feeling to the one I get in synagogue. I become spiritually uplifted when I sense something powerful and I feel the presence of G-d. Performers call that feeling 'being in the moment' and it is that towards which we all strive.

"The audience knows when they have experienced a good performance because in some way, it has changed their life. A wonderful performer such as Bette Midler shares herself on the stage and for a split second, she can reach the audience and change them. I am proud to do that."

She admits that although Toronto theatre has treated her well, she does see herself acting on Broadway one day.

Acting is a lifestyle commitment, but it is a commitment that is easy to make, Kurtz says. "In addition to staying fit and healthy, I even have to limit the amount of talking I do because it could change my vocal chords. If I enter a relationship one day, it would have to be with someone who understands my schedule and lifestyle."

JEWISH GEOGRAPHY PART I

This week, I attack the menacing pile of letters and press releases on my desk. Here, in alphabetical order, are some highlights:

* * *

ABC Islands: Caribbean travellers will know that the so-called ABC Islands refer to Aruba, Bonaire and Curacao, the trio of small resort isles off the coast of Venezuela, 2½ hours from Miami by air. Curacao, which has one of the oldest synagogues in the Western world and a historic Sephardi community, has been written up in this space before.

Less attention has been paid to its upscale sister, Aruba, whose 81,500 inhabitants represent a diverse mix of 43 nationalities, many living in the capital city of Oranjestad.

Aruba's One Cool Summer festivities feature weekly sailing regattas, a reef-cleaning dive, an underwater awareness week for divers and snorkellers at all levels of experience, a men's tennis tournament and an international deep-sea fishing tournament. Island hotels offer hot summer discounts up to 40 percent below winter prices. Aruba Tourism Authority, 800-268-3042.

* * *

British Airways Offers Free Car: Beginning on Canada Day, passengers flying British Airways from Toronto to Birmingham get more than a seat on a plane. The airline is celebrating the start of this new route by offering passengers seven days free car rental with unlimited mileage.

The offer of a free, self-drive car, complete with a complimentary phone service, runs to the end of October. Planes depart Toronto daily at 16:55, arrive at JFK Airport in New York at 18:30 and in Birmingham at 8 the next morning. Round trip fares start at $618.

* * *

Vive La France: This summer, an astonishing 57 flights per week leave Toronto for France, via Air France, Air Canada, Air Transat, Air Club, Canada 3000, Canadian Airlines and Royal Airlines.

Contact the French Tourist Office (416-593-4723) to obtain a list of about 70 Paris hotels that offer a third night free after a weekend stay. Sept. 14 and 15 are the dates of this year's French Patrimonial Days, which this year celebrate literature and light.

G Is For Germany: Exploring Germany, a 216-page, full-color pocket guide is available free from the German National Tourist Office in Toronto (416-968-1570). The guide is filled with maps, tips on where to shop and eat, cultural highlights, special events and other information. Although aimed at young people, it will also be useful for seasoned travellers.

Yiddish singer celebrates her first love

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Canadian stage star has come home to her first love — the Yiddish language.

In an unusual premiere concert to a sell-out audience, Beth Anne Cole said Yiddish folk and art songs are "the inside and outside of the same coat" and answer a yearning deep inside her.

As if to give this practical expression, the Ottawa-born singer twinned her own haunting English lyrics of her new song, All the Way Home with a song written in the Vilna ghetto by poet Lea Rudinsky expressing the loneliness of people forcibly separated.

Using her eyes and eyebrows as exclamation marks, and body language to enhance the story, the diminutive actor-singer's lush voice ranged all the way up and down the emotional scale with songs of humor, longing and puckishness, many of them adapted from her idol and mentor, the late Vienna-born singer, Martha Schlamme.

Cole is the complete artiste and an ideal choice for the first Friends of Yiddish concert to show that dramatic interpretations of old folk songs can enthrall, as they did the 200 attending the Ford Studio Theatre.

Her accompanists were Lona Davis, piano and Brian Katz, guitar.

TORONTO — The family that works together stays together — at least in the case of Andrew and Judy Menceles, owners of Cosmoda Corporation, marketer and distributor of fashion watches and designer and manufacturer of gift products and lifestyle accessories.

In the 21 years since the husband and wife team, parents of two boys aged 13 and 11, established the business, working out of a small space on Spadina Avenue, Cosmoda has grown to be a major force on the market. The company employs 25 people in their 15,000 square feet of office space in Downsview.

"We both grew up with a family business and we know the amount of work it takes to make a go of it. As well, our strengths complement each other. I develop concepts, while Judy is more detail oriented. The work just kind of naturally gets divided. Couples really can work together," Andrew Menceles says.

The thrust of the business in 1975 was gift items, but on a 1983 trip to New York, Menceles visited Macy's and happened upon a test run for Swatch watches.

"We had wanted to expand to include fashion accessories and this seemed to be what we were looking for," he says. "We became the first distributor in Canada to bring in Swatch watches and one of the first three distributors worldwide. They were great sellers."

Until 1979, Menceles, a chiropractor by profession, had his own practice and worked on Cosmoda business on the side, but "the appeal of merchandising and marketing was overwhelming, and I closed my office and devoted all my efforts to building the business with Judy."

Today, watches account for 60 percent of their business and the company distributes several brands, including Fossil and Giorgio Beverly Hills. Roots approached Cosmoda looking to license their name and Cosmoda has since become the first licensee to design Roots products including watches and a group of outdoor and personal accessories such as flashlights and compasses.

"Roots is very quality conscious and I believe that we are on the same wave length. With prices ranging from $75 to $130, they make good gifts.

"Right now, the watches are made in such places as the Far East, France and Germany, but we plan to start assembling them here so that we will really have a Canadian product. If we do our job properly, within five years, the vast majority of our products will be Canadian designed and exported around the world. There is no industry here yet; so we will have to buy all the necessary machinery.

"So far, we've shipped our products to Hong Kong, Korea and Taiwan, and in the fall, Roots watches will be launched in the Japanese market. We are anticipating sales in Japan to be greater than those in Canada."

This year, Cosmoda negotiated a licensing agreement with Disney Canada to design and produce the first ever RCMP watches, due to be on the market for the 1996 gift season.

"Branded products are making a comeback, while the no-names are dropping off," says Menceles. "That is because the consumer's purchase consideration before was price alone. However, if you produce a better product that is reasonably priced and features a twist of design or redefinition, the purchase becomes a happier, more satisfying event. There is and will continue to be a niche market for this type of product."

A major component of Cosmoda's success is in research and development, and Menceles says they are committed to designing and developing quality products that have strong consumer appeal.

"Cosmoda is product driven. In our opinion, the consumer is increasingly making an independent decision to purchase something they love and appreciate the quality and value of, without being influenced by advertising. This particular philosophy is an important one at our company. In fact, the concept of independently made purchase decisions is happening more and more, especially in North America.

"Everyone may not agree with this point of view, but it has worked for us and ultimately this type of approach will produce a better product, if not as many sales in the short term. Our view, however, is long term and therefore our challenge is to convince selective retailers to make the jump to our products. We are confident that exposure at the right retail outlets will generate sales."

A product developed by Cosmoda, of which they are particularly proud, is the Road Max, a moulded, tire-shaped, compact emergency road kit that contains booster cables, flashlight and batteries, tire inflator, first aid kit and other essentials for stranded motorists.

"It has been rated the number 1 gift item in the Neiman Marcus Christmas catalogue for the past two years," Menceles says. "At $50 retail, it is a great gift item, because it is the redefinition of something that everyone needs in their trunk. It is fun looking — not a greasy automotive type of product.

"Also available now is a soft pac, slightly lower-priced version of the Road Max, which is tire-shaped as well, but is offered in different colors.

"What we've done with the Road Max," he says, "is appeal to the mass market, to the high end market, to the men and to the women. We've covered everyone. In the past few months, we have reached a number of U.S. retailers including Bloomingdales, J. C. Penny's and Lord & Taylor. We will also be in such catalogues as Bloomingdale's by Mail, J. C. Penny and Sharper Image."

Offering the consumer good value is uppermost on Cosmoda's agenda. "It is not about price, it is about value. Good volumes can keep prices low," Menceles stresses.

"Our challenge is to design beautiful products that are affordable and long-lasting. With a wide variety of products, we aim to cover as much of the consumer market as possible. For example, our Beaver Canoe watches, also an international licence from Roots Canada and soon to be available in Canada, cost about $40 to $50; so they are quite popularly priced.

"It is also important to us to be appealing and to that end, our products carry a distinctive twist of design that take them beyond the usual. This could mean a special stitch on a piece of leather goods, the use of metallic color on an otherwise traditional material or a redefined shape to a customary design."

Although he travels several times a year, once to the Far East and a few times to Europe and the United States, Menceles makes sure that he is not away from home for long stretches. "It is important to be at home with my family — to balance my time properly — and Judy is always there when the boys get home.

"It would be easy to work 20 hours a day but I try to keep it down to 10. We've ensured that we don't have to be at the office every second.

"The business, though, is definitely our passion. When we started, we did not think about being successful; we were just doing what we liked. But we realized when you're passionate, you're successful. You have to be passionate," he stresses.

Wrestlers named to Canadian Olympic team

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two Jewish heavyweights with lots of mat experience have been named to Canada's Olympic wrestling team and will compete in freestyle events in Atlanta.

Andy Borodow and Oleg Ladik, both of Montreal, made the cut as Canada prepared its roster for the quadrennial games. Their coach, Victor Zilberman, believes both wrestlers should be competitive, and Ladik has a realistic shot at a medal, perhaps even a gold.

In a telephone interview from his home in Montreal, Zilberman said Ladik, who weighs in at 100 kilograms, has more than held his own in a match against the current world champ.

Last year in Atlanta, Ladik, 24, tied the eventual world champ in points but lost the match on a referee's decision. He went on to win the bronze medal match versus a competitor from Ukraine, but that result was overturned on a protest, Zilberman said.

Borodow, who's a 130-kilogram (287-pound) giant, faces an even greater challenge versus top wrestlers from the United States, Russia and Germany. The world champion, Bruce Baumgartner of the United States, is a handful and Borodow has never beaten him, Zilberman said.

Nevertheless, Borodow, 26, has tremendous upper body strength and lots of international experience, the coach added. He finished fifth at the '92 Olympics and he followed that up with the '94 and '96 Canadian championships. In 1994, he won the gold at the Jeux de la Francophonie and in '93, he was the gold medalist at the Maccabiah Games in Israel.

Ladik also returned home from the Holy Land with a gold medal in '93 and won the World Cup the same year. Canadian champ in 1993, '94 and '95, he won gold at the '94 Jeux de la Francophonie.

In 1985, Ladik, who hails originally from Kiev, Ukraine, was world junior champion. Zilberman has coached Ladik since he moved to Canada four years ago and he's been Borodow's coach ever since he was a feisty 11-year-old looking to mix it up.

Both wrestlers will compete in freestyle events, which differ from Greco-Roman in that wrestlers are not limited to upper body holds. In freestyle, they can grab their opponent's legs, trip them or otherwise take them down, Zilberman explained.

An international wrestler in his own day, Zilberman represented the Soviet Union at the 1973 European Championships, finishing second as a 74-kg freestyler.

After a year in Israel, during which he earned the Jewish state a third-place finish in the 1974 World Championships, he moved to Canada. In 1978, he won a silver medal at the Commonwealth Games.

A head coach for Vanier College, Concordia University, and the Montreal Wrestling Club, which all train together, Zilberman was head coach of the Canadian wrestling team at the 1988 Olympic Games. He later served as senior freestyle Olympic team coach at the '92 Barcelona Games and Canadian national team coach at the '93 World Senior Greco-Roman competition.

A native of Minsk, Belarus, he is slated to serve as head coach for Canada at the '97 Maccabiah Games in Israel and expects to have both Ladik and Borodow on the team.

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Selects could be in for perhaps their toughest challenge in the Striker Spirit Soccer Tournament, when they kick off Game 1 against powerful Poland.

If they can get by the Poles, the Selects will have cleared their biggest hurdle and have a realistic shot at the playoff round, said the team's coach, Martin Scott.

Following Poland, the Selects will tackle Nigeria and Chile. All three opponents are the tallest teams in the tournament, but "our spirit is in no way proportional to our size," Scott said.

The Jewish Selects are one of 16 teams that will compete in the tournament, which takes place from July 4 to 14 at Centennial Park Stadium in Etobicoke. Tickets are $5 per game and $2 of each ticket sold by the Selects will go to the charity of the team's choice. The remainder will go the the Canadian Red Cross, Metro Toronto region.

The Selects are comprised mostly of players from Toronto Maccabi, which has competed in the Toronto Services Soccer League (TSSL) for the past two years and was a finalist in the league's Consolation Cup in 1995. Toronto Maccabi has participated in other leagues since it was founded in 1982, as well as in the Scarborough Indoor Soccer League, getting to the semi-finals in the 1996 Consolation Cup.

Scott, in his first year as coach, believes the Maccabi team is the only adult, primarily Jewish team in Canada to participate in a non-Jewish league.

The TSSL is "a couple of steps below the Toronto and District League (TDL), in which Poland competes, Scott said. Nevertheless, he is optimistic that camaraderie and team spirit will keep his boys competitive.

The Selects' captain is Bradley Kalk, 29, who is originally from South Africa, where his father, Fred, was a well-known professional player.

Scott said he expects the Selects will form the nucleus of the indoor soccer team Canada will send to Israel for next summer's Maccabiah Games.

Scott is urging members of the Jewish community to attend Game 1 on Sunday, July 7 at noon to give the team moral support. Game 2 against Nigeria is scheduled for Monday, July 8 at 9 p.m. while game three versus Chile kicks off on Wednesday, July 10 at 7 p.m.

Life is a highway for Mississauga firm

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Canadian highway developer is part of an international consortium that's been shortlisted to tender a bid for the building of a hi-tech highway in Israel.

Mississauga-based Canadian Highways International Corp. (CHIC) is busy trying to help the consortium win the lucative contract, which has an advertised value of $750 million (US). Others in the group are Hughes Aircraft; SGG, a French firm; and Africa Israel Investments Ltd., a leading Israeli company with interests in real estate, hotels, construction and land development.

The consortium is one of four (down from six) being considered by Cross Israel Highway Corp., a state-owned company, to finance, design, build and maintain the first phase of a planned 300-kilometre expressway that will stretch from the Galilee to the Beersheva vicinity.

Road built for speed

Phase 1 will go from just east of Tel Aviv, 70 km south, with the possibility of another 20 km. It is envisioned to have speed limits of up to 130 km/hour, with two to four, and perhaps six, lanes in each direction.

Between eight and 10 interchanges are planned for Phase 1, which will connect the highway to east-west roads. The Knesset has already approved funding for two of the interchanges.

CHIC is confident because, as a spokesperson said, Israel has specified it wants a fully electronic toll collection system that will cause no delays, much like Ontario's Highway 407, currently under construction.

Free trade

Traffic studies have forecast that by the year 2010, volume on the completed highway will exceed 120,000 vehicles daily.

Final tenders will be submitted later this year.

* * *

Grofman provided a pep talk on joint ventures and investment in Israel, noting the country is alone in the world in enjoying free trade agreements with both the United States and the European Union.

Because of peace initiatives and a booming immigrant population, Grofman predicted Israel's foreign investments, exports and tourism sector will mushroom in the coming years.

About Seniors

Dear Jesse,

My mother lives close by and has been the surrogate parent to my children during some difficult times in my own family.

Last week, she was preparing lunch for my 8-year-old who had the croup and she forgot to turn off the burner, leaving the pot to burn and the smoke to fill the house. My child was rushed to the hospital to be treated for smoke-inhalation.

There have been several other incidents. None were as serious, but enough to raise concern. My mother's response is "accidents happen." I cannot trust her anymore or am I overreacting?

M.H.

Dear M.H.,

Perhaps you have to reconsider how much responsibility you give your mother. You might watch for other changes and encourage your mother to agree to an assessment (medical and psycho-social) to eliminate the possibility of a problem that might cause some of these changes.

Readers are invited to send any questions they have for Jesse to The CJN. Jesse is the executive director of Jewish Support Services for the Elderly (JSSE) in Montreal.

Netanyahu, Clinton meet

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — On his first visit to the United States as prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu was expected to stress the fight against terror as a condition for continuing peace negotiations.

His trip also was being seen as an opportunity to forge a new working relationship with President Bill Clinton, who demonstrated strong support for Shimon Peres, the former prime minister and Labor party leader.

During his visit, the Clinton administration is expected to seek clarifications from Netanyahu regarding his stand on the peace process.

Netanyahu has pledged to continue the peace process on all tracks. But he has rejected what he asserts are Arab efforts to set preconditions to negotiations.

Ahead of the trip, Israeli media outlined a five-point package Netanyahu would present, including:

• A promise in principle to redeploy Israeli forces in Hebron, with some adjustments to the security arrangements drawn up by the Peres government, and with no obligation to a timetable.

• Intent in principle to lift the closure of the West Bank and Gaza Strip, imposed at the end of February after the first of a series of suicide bombings.

• Support of international aid to the Palestinian Authority.

• Resumption of permanent-status negotiations with the Palestinians.

Netanyahu has made clear his opposition to the creation of a

Deportation process halted

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Federal Court decision ordering a stay of proceedings for three alleged Nazi war criminals has outraged the Jewish community and prompted calls for an appeal to a higher court.

The decision by Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen brings the denaturalization cases against Helmut Oberlander, Erichs Tobiass and Johann Dueck to a close.

In a 16-page decision released last week, Cullen ruled that a meeting between Assistant Deputy Attorney General Ted Thompson and Chief Justice Julius Isaac would lead a reasonable person to conclude "there has been judicial interference and that these three [men] would not be coming before an independent court."

Even if Associate Chief Justice James Jerome removed himself from the cases (he did so), "a reasonable person would conclude that ... another judge of this court could be perceived as responding to the pressure that was brought to bear by the chief justice and the assistant deputy attorney general," Cullen wrote. The stay proceedings were prompted by a March 1 meeting and an exchange of letters between Thompson and Isaac in which Thompson complained about the slow pace of proceedings in the cases. Isaac then contacted

Jewish Agency struggling

By CYNTHIA MANN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — The Jewish Agency for Israel is struggling for survival.

It is seeking to reform itself, in order to retain a meaningful role in Israel and remain attractive to donors in the Diaspora who are increasingly bypassing its campaign, in favor of other forms of philanthropy to Israel.

Many of the 400 delegates to the Agency's annual assembly last week left Jerusalem saying they were frustrated that little of substance was achieved, at a time when the Agency is experiencing both fiscal and identity crises.

In an effort to ease a crushing cash-flow crisis, the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) and the federations agreed to an emergency transfer of about $20 million (US).

The Agency, the primary recipient in Israel of funds from this joint campaign, faces a cumulative debt of $76 million.

Many delegates complained that the Agency remains bogged down by political and ideological differences between its partners in Israel and in the Diaspora.

AMERICANS WANT SUEZ CRISIS RESOLVED

Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's ambassador to the United States, confirmed that Washington wants to put pressure on Jerusalem and Cairo to reach an agreement in order to reopen the Suez Canal.

Diplomatic observers in Cairo said Egyptian leader Anwar Sadat does not contemplate renewing hostilities against Israel at least until the end of the year. One of the most important issues facing the U.S. is whether to renew the suggestion that Moscow join Washington in a new move for peace in the Middle East or continue its role as "honest" broker between Egypt and Israel. The State Department reaffirmed its belief that the possibility of a settlement exists.

Community outraged by war crimes decision

Jerome and later wrote to Thompson saying Jerome was unaware of the pressing time constraints involved in bringing the cases forward.

Criticizing his judicial colleague, Cullen said: "The influence or pressure that was brought to bear on [Jerome] is especially egregious." But, he continued, "it is not sufficient to say the ... cases are of such importance to Canadian society that the transgressions of the chief justice ... and [Thompson] should be overlooked. In my view, the fact that the accusations against the respondents are so serious demands a very high level of judicial independence ... The fact that these crimes are so serious and carry with them such moral approbation also demands that the judge who hears them is convinced by the evidence alone and not by pressure that was brought to bear by any outsider."

"I think it's an appalling decision," said Irving Abella, a spokesperson for Canadian Jewish Congress on war crimes issues. "It's overkill. The remedy is disproportionate to the crime ... It's a bizarre decision and it's insensitive."

"Justice is not served by stopping the proceedings against these three men," said Sol Littman, Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre (SWC). "Canada probably has the worst record in the Western world in gaining convictions" against Nazi war criminals, he added.

"The outcome of this decision is that Canada has de facto become a haven for accused Nazi war criminals in these cases ... The court's grant of immunity for these alleged mass murderers does more to place the Canadian judicial system in disrepute than the actions of the chief justice of the Federal Court and the assistant deputy minister," said David Matas, honorary senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Abella called the decision "an Alice in Wonderland judgement... [Cullen] agrees the crimes are heinous and therefore any transgression must allow the prosecution to be stayed. It's reasoning that escapes me."

It would be like a judge saying that "on a technicality, someone like Clifford Olson or Paul Bernardo could walk away free simply because a lawyer asked the court to hurry it along," he added.

'We're gravely concerned'

John Sims, assistant deputy attorney general, citizenship and immigration, said "we're gravely concerned that these three cases have been stayed...Society has a right to have significant cases tried on their merits. It's important that the courts deal with the issues raised in Oberlander, Dueck and Tobiass."

Sims said Cullen's decision wouldn't deter federal authorities from launching proceedings in other cases involving alleged war criminals. Notices of Intention to Revoke Citizenship have already been filed in two other cases and an announcement of the details of one of the cases can be expected imminently, Sims said.

Federal prosecutors have failed miserably in bringing Nazi war criminals to justice. Since the Criminal Code was amended in 1987 to allow for domestic prosecutions, three cases were stymied in preliminary stages. Former Hungarian gendarme Imre Finta was acquitted after a trial. In an appeal, the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that Finta's anti-Semitic belief that Jews were enemies of Hungary precluded him from having a guilty mind.

Following that decision, government authorities took a different approach — they attempted to strip alleged Nazis of their citizenship and deport them.

An immigration adjudicator ruled in the Nemsila case that his five years of domicile in Canada saved him from facing deportation for his wartime activities.

That decision was taken to the Federal Court, where Jerome presided over the appeal. Following the launch of stay proceedings in the Dueck, Oberlander and Tobiass case, Nemsila's lawyer Barbara Jackman sought a stay of proceedings in his case as well.

Last week, Jackman, Justice Department lawyers and counsel for four interveners including Congress, the League, the SWC and an association of Montreal synagogues were in court for the Nemsila case. Jerome said he would hear legal arguments on Jackman's stay application on July 18 and 19, according to Steven Shulman, who is monitoring the case for Congress.

Jerome suggested he was ready to rule on the domicile issue if he does not award a stay, Shulman added.

One other case, involving alleged war criminal Konrads Kalejs, is being heard by a Toronto Immigration adjudicator. That case differs from the others in that Kalejs is an Australian citizen with no status as a Canadian citizen or permanent resident.

'Meteor on the Jewish skies' left lasting legacy

I am writing these words on the 20th of Tammuz. Ninety-two years ago, in 1904, the 20th of Tammuz fell on July 3. On that day, Theodor Benjamin Ze'ev Herzl died. He was only 44.

But it is not to recall the anniversary of his death, per se, that I write about Herzl.

This year and next, Jewish communities will be commemorating a number of significant Herzl-related anniversaries, one of them, the 100th year since the publication of his major work, Der Judenstaat (The Jewish State). Prof. Naomi Elboim-Dror wrote about Herzl's life and vision in the Feb. 15. issue of The CJN.

On Aug. 29, 1997, we will celebrate 100 years since the first Zionist conference in Basel, Switzerland. It was at that conference, organized by Herzl, that Zionism, the movement for the establishment of a home for the Jewish people in Eretz Yisrael, entered the psyche and climbed onto the agenda of the modern Western world. As an aside, it is worthy to note that of all the ideologies and "liberation" movements spawned by the upheaval, despair and optimism of the Enlightenment and the Industrial Revolution, Zionism is one of the few, if not the only, movement that succeeded, that remains a creative, people-defining force to this very day.

It is for another reason though that I write about Herzl. His short life teaches that for human beings to achieve, we must liberate ourselves from cynicism, doubt and suspicion, even in this age of rampant materialism, mass media conformity and public corruption. Though a famous song writer once wrote, "we must keep a clear eye to the dirty ways of the world," defeatism is not a natural harbor for the human being. Human beings were intended to sail in the open seas of life's possibilities and promise.

Herzl was born in Budapest on May 2, 1860. He was educated in an "enlightened," liberal Jewish household. In 1878, his family moved to Vienna and he enrolled in the law school at the University of Vienna. In 1884, he received his doctorate of laws. But just one year later, he abandoned the courts of law to take up a career in writing. Eventually he became the Paris correspondent of the Vienna Neue Freie Presse, one of Europe's leading newspapers of the time. It was at this post that the young journalist witnessed the trial and public humiliation of Alfred Dreyfus, along with the blood-chilling Paris mobs screaming for "death to the Jews."

Europe's irrational, demonic, insatiable anti-Semitism was the crystal that eventually formed Herzl's driving passion to establish a homeland for the Jews. When he began his work on behalf of the Jewish people, he had fewer than 10 years left to live.

In Elboim-Dror's words: "Herzl's Zionist activity lasted but nine short years ... But during those years he succeeded in making a fundamental change in the Jewish world: He transformed the self-image of the Diaspora Jew; he converted the bourgeois, conservative Chovevei Zion movement into a revolutionary nationalistic and modern Jewish protest movement; he institutionalized the Zionist idea and established the foundations of the state-in-the-making.

"Without doubt Herzl is one of the greatest leaders history has known, one of the few whose vision changed history and became reality.

"He was the first leader who gave a clear political definition of the solution to the Jewish problem and acted to implement it. Herzl's message was phrased clearly and unequivocally – the establishment of a Jewish state. He was the first who dared to declare this openly, to speak on behalf of modern Jewish nationalism and to work to implement it."

Elboim-Dror writes: "Herzl appeared as a meteor on the Jewish skies." The imagery of the meteor is very effective, evoking a sharp flash of bright light against a dark, unilluminated background. But though evocative, the image is somewhat inadequate.

A meteor is ephemeral, a tail of light which leaves merely a short-lived visual splendor high in the sky. Its residue is more in the mind than on the ground.

Herzl, however, became a fixture, a permanent star in the constellation of idealism. He was a beacon. He cast a clear piercing beam into a gloomy Jewish world. He illuminated the corridors of nationalism which, to that point in modern history had remained dark and untravelled for Jews. He resuscitated a dream. And he revived a people.

But he was a human being, like all of us, at times filled with misgivings, frail in the face of illness and disease, fallible in matters of human relations. His marriage was unhappy; his three children were very troubled. By any description, the fate of his family was tragic. His eldest daughter suffered from severe emotional and psychiatric instability. His son killed himself when his older sister died. His younger daughter was killed in Thereisenstadt. Her son, Herzl's only grandchild, was an officer in the British army. After leaving the army, he became an economic adviser in the British mission in Washington, where he committed suicide by jumping from a bridge.

Herzl's life is a reminder to us all, and to our young generation in particular, that human beings are the most precious unit of existence on this planet, that each individual is immeasurably significant, that individuals can change the course of human history.

History is a "partnership of sorts" between the Divine plan and human endeavor. Rather than dwell on the inscrutability of the plan and thereby excuse human inaction, it falls to us, to individual human beings, to show constant initiative, to strive constantly for human betterment.

Three days after the conclusion of the Basel conference in 1897, Herzl wrote in his diary: "If I were to sum up the Congress in a word – which I shall take care not to publish – it would be this: At Basel I founded the Jewish State. If I said this out loud today, I would be greeted by universal laughter. In five years perhaps, and certainly in 50 years, everyone will perceive it."

Fifty-one years later on the 28th of Iyar, the State of Israel was proclaimed; and it is Herzl's portrait, flaming dark eyes, stern countenance, magisterial bearing, bearded like an ancient sage, but altogether human, which hangs in the Knesset, forever framed in time and history.

Reena reduces budgets as government cuts funding

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Having to do more with less.

That's been the buzz-phrase at every social service organization's annual meeting this past spring, and it's no different at Reena.

The Jewish organization that helps developmentally disabled adults integrate into the community through independent living will be facing a cumulative six percent reduction in funding by next year, due mainly to provincial government cuts, Reena's annual meeting was told late last month.

Outgoing chair Rob Berkovitz said he expects no increases in government funds for the foreseeable future, while at the same time, Reena's clients have increased to about 240 from 200 a year ago.

The treasurer's report mirrored trends taking place elsewhere: Reena ran a deficit of $53,000 this past year, because of a $300,000 cut to its budget. Since 1993, funding from Queen's Park has decreased by over $650,000.

As well, household budgets at Reena's group homes were slashed by 20 percent and a "painful" decision was made to sell Camp Reena's site in Orangeville. The camp program was discontinued in 1992.

But it's not all gloom. Reena's much-anticipated Toby and Henry Battle Centre is slated for completion this fall. The 45,000-square-foot facility on Clark Avenue in Thornhill will be one of only two or three such centres in the world. It will feature day and drop-in programs, a computer workshop, a wellness centre, a greenhouse and activities ranging from creative arts to exercise in a fully-equipped gym.

Just last month, Reena opened a resource office to reach out to those currently not receiving service (see accompanying story).

Stepping down from Reena's board of directors are Berkovitz, Howard Book, David Cole, Terry Kaufman, Susan Roher and Hy Eiley.

Angela Iannuzziello was welcomed as the new chair. New board members are Rob Brickman, Howard Kerbel, Ruth Ladowsky, Pearl Schusheim, Joel Snitman and Howard Ungerman.

Reena's Employer of the Year was Swenson Canada Inc., a health and beauty supplies distributor that employs a Reena client, while Employee of the Year was Reena client Goldy Slomovitz.

Resource office open

TORONTO — Opened just last month, Reena's new Resource Office functions as a kind of proactive intake service for non-clients and a one-stop referral centre. It also listens.

Staffed by Brenda Rothenberg, the office is identifying and assisting Jewish families with very young developmentally disabled children, because early intervention is seen as crucial.

It's also finding aging parents of developmentally disabled adults still living at home, and listening to their concerns.

"We will listen to anyone," Rothenberg says. "There are no boundaries."

The office can also help with financial planning and psychiatric and psychological support, as well as facilitating access to Reena's own resources and providing referrals to other services.

"Families [of the developmentally disabled] may not have any idea of the limited resources out there," Rothenberg adds. The office can also help families tap into family benefits and little-known government funds.

The office is an outgrowth of a strategic plan Reena launched in 1993. Among the goals was to eliminate Reena's waiting list, which persists at roughly 200. Those on the list have been contacted to help them prepare.

The office is also a response to government cutbacks. It's believed that early, long-range planning will allow Reena to get to know families and their financial situations, well before children can become clients.

"It's also a chance to get to know families. We can see them through the whole journey," says Rothenberg, whose own adult son is a Reena client.

Muslims, Jews discuss racism

BY BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO – Shahid Akhtar, convenor of an inaugural symposium of the Canadian Association of Jews and Muslims, admitted that some Toronto-area Muslims tried to discourage him from organizing a dialogue between the two communities.

"One man said, 'Why rush into it? Why not unite your own community first?'" Akhtar reported. "I said, 'Thank you, I'll call you back in a thousand years.' "

Akhtar and co-convenor Jack Stevens were among eight speakers from the local Jewish and Muslim communities to address the gathering in the B'nai Brith building in North York.

Appropriately, it was in those very premises that Jewish and Muslim leaders met five years ago, after a wave of vandalism and harassment hit both communities during the Gulf War, recalled Karen Mock, national director of the B'nai Brith League for Human Rights.

"Within a few days, we had leaders from both communities sitting down right here in this building to talk about it," she said. "Everyone recognized that it was important that we work out concerted strategies ... That very weekend, we had imams speaking out against anti-Semitism and rabbis speaking out against racism."

Akhtar seemingly expressed a fundamental principle behind the gathering when he said: "When there's anti-Semitism, we should be talking about that anti-Semitism in mosques, and asking, 'Why is it that our counterparts are being made targets?' And when there's discrimination against Muslims, the pain should be felt in the Jewish community as well."

Nuzhat Jafri, formerly with the provincial employment equity office, declared that social intolerance is on the rise, and cited the recent rash of arson attacks on black churches in the southern United States.

"It's time for Jews and Muslims to start working together to help turn around the tide of intolerance," she said.

In Spain in a former day, Jews and Muslims lived side by side in a highly civilized, educated and tolerant multicultural society, recalled Erna Paris, author of The End Of Days, a book about Spain's golden era and its downfall.

"It was a Muslim-Arabic umbrella society, where everyone spoke Arabic but which protected minorities," she said. "It reminded me of Canada, a multicultural country with a central identity but with protected minorities folded within it."

The idea, according to Rabbi Dow Marmur from the Holy Blossom Temple, was not to talk politics or religion, but to attempt a dialogue on secular grounds. "We live in a country where rabbis have no power whatsoever, and I think that's a cause for celebration," he said.

"The sorry result of the fusion of religion and political power has bedevilled Christianity and Islam, and is about to bedevil Judaism when it gains access to political power."

Rabbi Marmur to stay as committee chair

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Despite calls from a "handful" of the 80 members of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region's Israel affairs committee for his resignation, Rabbi Dow Marmur has decided to stay on as committee chair.

"I will not allow disruptive elements to take over; it is not in our interest," Rabbi Marmur told the region's executive meeting recently.

Later, he told The CJN he did not want to identify the "faction" calling for his resignation or name names. He said he merely wanted to "note" it for the executive.

"Rabbi Marmur has the full confidence of the Ontario region chair [Moshe Ronen] and of the regional executive," CJC Ontario region executive director Manuel Prutschi later told The CJN.

"As the region chair knows, I've wanted to step down, but I thank the ones who wanted me to quit for convincing me not to," Rabbi Marmur said.

To update CJC leaders on the intentions of the new Israeli government, Rabbi Marmur said a briefing meeting is to be arranged soon through the good offices of the Israel's consulate general.

A briefing with a broader group of community leaders will take place after Rosh Hashanah, he said. Divisions within the community will not be ignored at these briefings, Rabbi Marmur pledged.

The committee has decided to set up a media watch subcommittee chaired by Genya Intrator, in view of a change in the tone of the general media in reports on Israel affairs, Rabbi Marmur said. The subcommittee will develop its own mission statement, he added.

"There is a campaign to vilify the present goverment in the media," said delegate David Rotenberg.

Ontario region policy is to support the Israeli government, irrespective of its make-up of political parties, Ronen said. The region executive insists on trying to keep the community united, he added.

Rabbi Stroh marks 25 years at Temple Har Zion

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At the age of 32, Rabbi Michael Stroh was chosen to be the spiritual leader of Temple Har Zion. The congregation did not have a home and held its first High Holy Day services in a church on Finch Avenue.

Today, 25 years later, Rabbi Stroh is still head of the Reform congregation, now the third largest in the Toronto area (after Holy Blossom and Temple Sinai). He was honored at a dinner and special worship service recently.

His congregation's membership has grown from eight founders (including Philip Epstein, Lawrie Kaplan, Susan Bordo and Martin Gelfand) to 600 families who attend services in the Temple's handsome building in Thornhill, just north of Steeles Avenue.

It is also the location of the most famous joint parking lot in Canada (shared by Temple Har Zion and its next door neighbor, the Ja'ffari Islamic Centre). In fact, at the dinner, Imam Leyakatali Takim, the mosque's spiritual leader, apologized to the diners. Because of a special service at his centre that night, he said, "the border had to be closed."

The growth of Temple Har Zion parallels that of Toronto's Jewish community, both in numbers and location, Rabbi Stroh noted. When the temple first formed in 1971, most of its members lived in North York, while today most are in Thornhill, Vaughan and points north.

Rabbi Michael Stroh

A native New Yorker, Rabbi Stroh said he felt at home the second he arrived in Toronto in 1966 to become an assistant rabbi at Holy Blossom.

Before he left New York, he recalled that the social dividing line between Jew and gentile was a firm one. "What was Jewish was Jewish and the intermarriage rate was only two per cent. Now, that period is over and we have concerns over intermarriage and assimilation. On the one hand we have Jews who want more in the way of spiritual support, and we must respond, and there are Jews who are indifferent and may marry non-Jews, and yet one day they may come back and be active members of the synagogue."

One of the attractions of the Toronto community for Rabbi Stroh, he said, is its greater affinity to traditional values than in cities he knows in the United States.

"Whether this will be true of the next generation is not for me to say," he remarked.

Turning to events in Israel at the request of The CJN, Rabbi Stroh said that from the point of view of legal rights for the Reform and Conservative movements, the recent election results "mean a rough time for a few years."

He said he believes the legal rights established by the Israel Supreme Court will be outlawed by legislation, as part of the deal made by the new government with the Orthodox parties.

"However, concessions to the Orthodox may help us in the long run, because there is increasing resentment in the Israeli population over the price paid for the deal. The amount of money to buy them off is out of proportion to that given to other institutions, not just religious institutions."

The task of the Reform and Conservative movements is to win the hearts of Israelis, he said, "because legal victories can only take you so far."

Keshet Shalom introduces new prayer book

By GIL KEZWER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The 70 members of Toronto's Congregation Keshet Shalom celebrated Gay Pride Week by introducing their own degenderized Hebrew-English prayer book.

The new siddur, Keshet Be-Anan (A Rainbow in the Cloud), was introduced at the congregation's Friday evening service during a recent Oneg Shabbat.

The congregation is currently using a siddur for Kabbalat Shabbat services which they created about five years ago, according to past president Howard Goldstein.

Their goal in the new siddur, he said, was to "produce a new, egalitarian version of our prayer book ... which removes any reference to God as male, in order that our service be more inclusive."

The siddur's name refers to both the rainbow covenant God made with Noah (Genesis 9:12-17) and the congregation itself. It also alludes to the liberation rainbow flag of the lesbian/gay/bisexual movement.

All Hebrew passages are transliterated in the book, which was typeset on Dagesh, a multi-lingual Windows processor.

The new prayer book was inspired by the Shavat va-Yinafash siddur of Congregation Bet Mishpachah in Washington, D.C. Material was also adapted from the Reconstructionist Press' Kol ha-N'shama.

Though gay Jewish social groups exist in Montreal and Winnipeg, and one used to exist in Vancouver, Keshet Shalom — which was founded in 1992 — is the first such shul in Canada. The congregation is a member of the World Congress of Gay and Lesbian Jewish Organizations, an international umbrella group with 60 members in Israel, Europe and North and South America.

Chutzpah

Toronto's gay Jewish community has gone through several metamorphoses since its establishment in the early 1980s. Previously the group had been known as Chutzpah. The establishment of their own synagogue marked an official coming out of the Jewish community closet, Goldstein said.

Judaism's historic taboo against homosexuality, which is decried in Leviticus 18:22 and 20:13 as an abomination, is crumbling, he suggested. Keshet Shalom is now a member of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region, the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto and the Downtown Jewish Community Council.

The group initially found a home at the Cecil Street Community Centre near Kensington Market, but they outgrew the former synagogue, and now meet at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) for Friday night services.

"We're proud to have a siddur that reflects both the Jewish tradition and the special nature of our community," said Goldstein.

The pity and the shame

Like a twisted hand that suddenly seizes one by the throat, the decision last week by Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen to halt deportation proceedings against three alleged Nazi war criminals has left everyone who seeks to bring war criminals to justice, including the Canadian Jewish community, gasping in disbelief. It has also discredited the Canadian justice system.

Cullen ruled that an attempt by the federal government to expedite the deportation proceedings, already underway, so compromised the fairness of the process that "that the three men would not be coming before an independent court."

The decision was the result of a chain of events that began with a meeting on March 1, without notice to the defendants, between Assistant Deputy Attorney General Ted Thompson and the Chief Justice of the Federal Court Julius Isaac. At that meeting Thompson bemoaned the slow pace of the proceedings and said that the government was considering taking the cases to the Supreme Court of Canada. Isaac met with the presiding judge, spoke to him about the need to move the proceedings along and reported back to the assistant deputy attorney general. The meeting between Thompson and Isaac, which Cullen described as "clandestine," inevitably came to light. The presiding judge removed himself from the proceedings. Astutely, defence counsel seized the opportunity to challenge the validity of the entire process, urging that the cases be thrown out.

Cullen agreed. In a ruling dripping with indignation he wrote: "This is not a case about the institutional independence of this court; this is about the liberty of an individual judge to hear and decide the cases free of interference from the chief justice..."

We profoundly regret his decision. We believe Cullen overreacted. In the constant weighing of competing legitimate interests, which is the ongoing burden of true independent judging, he cast too great a punitive stone onto one side of the scales.

We hold no brief for the action of the assistant deputy attorney general, although we sympathize with his aim. It was a misguided effort to make the inexcusably slow proceedings move faster.

Any perception of influence over the proceedings by one of the parties was immediately washed away, however, when the presiding judge removed himself. A new judge brought with him a new slate. By characterizing the case as one about "the liberty of the individual judge to hear and decide the cases" Cullen ignored the long and painful record of the cases. He ignored the human and legal context of the proceedings. He also ignored the fact that there was no suggestion of an infringement on his own liberty "to hear and decide" these specific cases. He could have found a proper remedy for the attorney's "indiscretion" while proceeding to hear the cases on their merits. Indeed former chief justice of Ontario, Charles Dubin, and the Law Society of Upper Canada are investigating the attorney's conduct.

By refusing to do so, Cullen exposed his questionable logic. "The fact that these crimes are so serious," he wrote, "also demands that the judge who hears them is convinced by the evidence alone, and not by pressure..." Yet, by throwing the cases out, he permanently foreclosed the possibility of hearing and judging by the evidence alone.

Cullen's decision is even more shameful in light of something else he said. "The public must be assured that anyone coming before the court will be treated fairly..." The three alleged Nazi war criminals were not the only ones who had come before the court. Also standing before His Honor in federal court were the memories of the murdered victims. It was for their sake too as well as for the sake of conscience, decency and the integrity of the Canadian judicial system that these proceedings were launched in the first place. By ending the process at this stage, have they been treated fairly? We think not. It is our fervent hope that Cullen's decision will be appealed to a higher court.

Who was 'conned' in Israeli election?

According to Simon Rosenblum of Canadian Friends of Peace Now (CJN, June 27), the floating Israeli voters were "conned" by Benjamin Netanyahu when he crafted a pro-peace message, which Rosenblum thinks Netanyahu does not really believe in.

In the previous election, the Labor Party campaigned on the basis of no negotiation with the PLO, no Palestinian state and no withdrawal from the Golan Heights. During the intervening term, they negotiated secret deals with the PLO, announced their willingness to accept a Palestinian state and laid the groundwork for withdrawal from the Golan Heights. Presumably none of this constituted "conning" the voter.

Rosenblum may be unwilling to take Netanyahu's statements at face value and after their experience with the Rabin/Peres administration, so might the Israeli voter. But the voters concluded that their security and peace interests would be best served by Netanyahu. In other words, the only people "conned" in this year's election were the Meretz/Labor leadership. They fooled themselves into thinking that, as they marched recklessly into the New Middle East of their dreams, the majority of Israelis were marching behind them. The floating voters set them straight.

Zundel insults Holocaust survivors

I am a survivor of the Holocaust. I was permitted to come to Canada from the concentration camps to rebuild my life. I chose Canada because of the freedom it allows to all its citizens.

Ernst Zundel immigrated to Canada like I did, except his reasons were different. He has continually spread vicious lies that the Holocaust never happened. By spreading all this hate and lies about the Holocaust, he then in turn insults all of the Holocaust survivors, like myself. He has lied to the Canadian government in order to immigrate to Canada.

In Germany, the law would be to incarcerate Mr. Zundel because the Holocaust did, in fact, occur.

Ernst Zundel is not a Canadian citizen as of yet. What kind of politicians and law-makers do we have here in Canada that would allow a hatemonger such as Zundel to remain here in our country to use and abuse our laws.

Canada is known as a free and humane country. Does this mean that Zundel has the same rights and freedom as all other Canadians and can continue to accuse and insult all Holocaust survivors here in Canada and get away with it?

The Palestinian state is Jordan

The Arab Summit has warned Israel to keep the peace or face "tensions." Their proposal is peace for land. But how do they justify their need for land? There is ample evidence that their combined countries possess millions of hectares of vacant land, whereas the entire state of Israel covers an area about the size of Lake Ontario.

They demand that Israel offer land for peace, by withdrawing from the West Bank where they plan to establish a Palestinian state. But that is sheer duplicity. A Palestinian state is already in existence. When Britain partitioned ancient Palestine, the Arabs were awarded the major part of the territory, which became known as Jordan. Now two thirds of its citizens are of Palestinian origin. They and their counterparts in Israel are basically the same people. They share the same language, religion, traditions and customs. By legitimizing Jordan as the Palestinian state, with Amman as its capital, the argument about land for peace becomes irrelevant and the Israeli hope for a true peace can become a reality.

Canadian Jewish volunteers helped secret fleet

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Eli Cohen can be forgiven for referring to Israel's 1956 and 1967 wars as mere "incidents." After all, he has something to compare them to.

"I was in the Sinai in '56 and on the Golan Heights in '67," Cohen, 68, told The CJN in a telephone interview from Ra'ananna, just north of Tel Aviv. "They were terribly exciting. But when I compare that to six months aboard the Wedgwood, well..." His voice trails off, like that of someone comparing caviar to tinned tuna.

"That whole experience was so remarkable, it will remain in my imagination forever. Aside from my children, it was the greatest joy of my life."

The wars he fought in later were "incidents," but taking part in the shaping of pre-state Israel was "monumental."

"For me, it was the Holy Grail."

Precisely 50 years ago, Cohen, a Montreal native who stayed in his beloved Israel following his great adventure, was serving as a raw volunteer sailor aboard a warship called the Beauharnois (later the Wedgwood). He didn't know it at the time, but the Canadian corvette would enter the history books as the first North American-manned ship of the clandestine Aliyah Bet movement to be captured by the British.

Cohen was among some 240 North Americans, including about a dozen Canadians, who served on the storied vessels that tried to smash Britain's blockade of Palestine from 1945 until Israel's independence in 1948. In that frenzied period of desperate emigration from Holocaust-ravaged Europe, 64 ships set out, bearing some 70,000 men, women and children bound for Palestine in an illegal operation known as Aliyah Bet.

Ten of the vessels had crews made up mainly of young American and Canadian volunteers, still fresh from their World War II experience and eager to do what they could for Jews who survived Hitler. These young men preceeded the members of the famed Machal, the foreign volunteers who fought in Israel's War of Independence. Many later became Machalniks themselves.

Leon Uris made the period famous in his masterpiece Exodus, also the name of one of the ships. Canadians served aboard other vessels, including the Haim Arlosoroff, the Hatikvah, the Jewish State, the Geula and the Wedgwood.

Together, they combined to transport 32,000 people from European ports to the shores of Palestine, only to face capture by the British Navy and see their haggard charges interned in dreadful refugee camps on Cyprus. But on another level, the North American-manned ships accomplished something no one else could do until then: use good old American PR to shift world opinion away from the British — especially the Wedgwood, which held 1,257 Jewish refugees from Europe.

Cohen, now retired, recalls the incident well: Just before the ship was towed into Haifa's harbor by a British destroyer on June 26, 1946, a banner was unfurled from the mast reading: "We survived Hitler. Death is no stranger to us. Nothing can keep us from our Jewish homeland. The blood is on your head if you fire on this unarmed ship."

Photographs of this and other demonstrations found their way onto the front pages of newspapers around the world and stirred Western sympathies. Their impact on world opinion — especially on the weary British taxpayer — convinced London to hand the whole matter of Palestine over to the United Nations, which would vote to partition the land between Arabs and Jews.

Passengers of the Wedgwood, the first North American Aliyah Bet vessel to be captured by the British. Inset: Ben Ocopnick, who served aboard the Haim Arlosoroff.

According to Murray Greenfield, a New Yorker who served on the Hatikvah and went on to co-author The Jews' Secret Fleet, an impressively detailed account of those years, the American and Canadian volunteers used in the operation gave Aliyah Bet the publicity boost it needed to protest British restrictions on Jewish immigration.

"Until we got into it, they had to rely on small ships and unreliable European crews," Greenfield recalls. "When the North Americans came, we made the noise."

* * *

The first Aliyah Bet boat to land in Palestine in August 1945 brought 35 refugees. Before the end of that year, seven more vessels arrived with a total of about 1,000 people. These successes may have been moral victories but they weren't enough. The plight of Jewish displaced persons in Europe was desperate and the Jewish Agency stepped up its efforts to find bigger and faster vessels for Aliyah Bet.

Across the Atlantic, Jewish volunteers went to work. Operating secretly with Haganah emissaries from Palestine, American Jews arranged to buy two war-surplus corvettes from the Royal Canadian Navy. These 650-ton former warships, capable of 20-knot speeds, could carry large numbers of refugees and present a new challenge to the mounting British blockade. And they would be manned by North American volunteers instead of hired crews. Canada's own Norsyd became the Haganah, while the Beauharnois was later rechristened the Wedgwood, after Josiah Wedgwood, the British statesman and advocate of Zionism.

In 1945, Eli Cohen was 17 and had just missed serving in World War II. A Baron Byng High School alumnus, he headed a local chapter of Montreal's Habonim youth, and was approached by an emissary from New York. Was he interested in serving on a ship overseas for a few months?

"He convinced me quickly," Cohen remembers. "I was 17 and not afraid of anything. The only reason I got on the ship was because I wanted to go to Israel. I had no idea of what was to come."

Sworn to secrecy like the other volunteers, Cohen received some training in City Island near the Bronx, where the ship was retrofitted, including removal of its gun emplacements. She set out for Italy in April 1946, with Cohen stationed in the engine room. A week later, the ship broke down.

"The sea was absolutely furious," Cohen recalls. "Everyone was seasick but me." The rough waters rendered the inexperienced sailors too ill to maintain the engines and pumps. "One day, I went up to see the captain. He was white as a sheet, not because he was sick, but because he didn't think we would make it."

The ship made it to the Azores, where she was repaired. It was then on to the Italian port of Savona, where she took on over 1,200 Jewish refugees from 14 different countries, but mostly Polish. Crammed below deck on wooden planks, they faced unbearable heat, food and water shortages and potentially, a sanitation nightmare. But on June 19, they sang Tzena, Tzena as they slipped away to Palestine.

On June 25, a British destroyer spotted the Wedgwood just 100 kilometres from the coast of Palestine. Concluding that capture was inevitable, the Haganah command decided to offer only token resistance. The next day, just minutes from Haifa, the now-famous banner was unfurled. British marines boarded and pulled down the Star of David as passengers wept and sang Hatikvah, joined by watchers from the shore. "I'll never forget that scene," Cohen says, his voice choking.

A convoy of buses took the weary passengers to the Athlit detention camp, south of Haifa, where some remained and others were repatriated,

For the British, the voyage of the Wedgwood was a taste of things to come. Other ships on which Canadians served, like the Haim Arlosoroff, offered much stiffer resistance, but the result was the same. The ships were seized or routed directly to Cyprus, where barbed-wire camps like those they just had survived awaited the passengers.

Ironically, just one month after independence, Israel's fledgling navy used the Wedgwood to shell and sink the Altalena, the famous cargo ship loaded with arms for the rebel Irgun faction led by Menachem Begin. Toronto's Ben Ocopnick, now 71, manned the guns on the Wedgwood in that battle, which threatened the young state with civil war, but as he puts it, "that's another story."

Earlier, Ocopnick served aboard the Haim Arlosoroff, a Prohibition-era revenue cutter originally called the Ulua. It was a ship that would give Aliyah Bet a new dimension of danger.

Fresh from air force and army duty during the war, Ocopnick heard through Habonim youth in Toronto that volunteers were needed for a mysterious mission to Palestine. In a few days, he was in New York and then Baltimore, where he boarded the ship in October 1946. "We were all young and eager," he recalls.

The ship arrived in Marseilles for refitting and in January 1947, put into the Swedish port of Trelleborg, where she picked up 664 passengers. Of these, 500 were Polish and German teenaged girls, survivors of the camps who had been rescued in a secret deal between Swedish officials and Gestapo chief Heinrich Himmler. Thus the boat was nicknamed "the bride ship."

But near Palestine, the British pounced and things got ugly. Ocopnick led an anti-boarding party and soon the two sides were engaged in a classic battle at sea, including hand-to-hand combat. Passengers hurled iron bars, bolts, clubs and even tins of food at boarding British sailors, who responded with tear gas and bullets fired across the bow. It was the fiercest fight the British had yet faced. When the dust settled, most of the refugees were taken to Cyprus, including Ocopnick, who escaped after three months. But that too is "another story."

Today, like Cohen, Ocopnick keeps old photos, yellowed newspaper clippings and documents about his adventure like the treasures they are. In February, Ocopnick will travel to Israel for a reunion to mark the 50th anniversary of the Haim Arlosoroff's arrival. Perhaps that too will be another story.

Opinions

'Who is a Jew' a difficult problem

A disconcerting situation has forced me to deliberate one of the most controversial questions in Judaism: Who is a Jew?

By Niva Press

I learned at Hebrew day school that Jewishness is determined matrilineally. But what if someone's father alone is Jewish and she or he identifies with Judaism?

I know that we are the people of the Book and if we start making exceptions to one law then what would stop us from making exceptions to all of the laws? But aren't there still some cases which involve Jewish patrilineal lineage that we need to reevaluate?

My cousins in Harare, the capital of Zimbabwe, are in a fix. He is Jewish. His wife wants to convert to Judaism, but does not want an Orthodox conversion because her husband is Conservative. Their three sons are enrolled at the Sharon Hebrew Day School. But only two of them identify with Judaism.

The eldest of the three is 11 years old. Until last year, he took Jewish studies and Hebrew together with all the other students. He loved going to shul on Friday nights, following the service, and celebrating the Jewish holidays at home with his family. He was also at the top of his class in Hebrew. He considered himself a Jew.

Last year the school board passed a new mandate that only Jewish students beyond the age of 10 could continue with Hebrew classes. The majority of students at the Sharon school are non-Jewish.

And so, this A-plus student was removed from his Hebrew class. After futile attempts by his parents to convince the school to allow him to study a subject he loved, he rebelled against the faith of his father.

He no longer attends Friday night services. He mocks his younger brothers when they celebrate a Jewish holiday. He openly states, "I'm not a Jew." In fact, he scoffs at anything remotely Jewish.

Meanwhile, hundreds of non-Jewish students are studying Hebrew as an elective of choice in universities and schools all over the world. What's more, his non-Jewish counterparts in Bulawayo, Zimbabwe's second largest city, are studying Hebrew. All students, Jewish and non-Jewish, study both Hebrew and Jewish studies at the Bulawayo Hebrew School.

The Harare Jewish community, despite its dwindling number, won't accept anything but an Orthodox conversion. Ironically, the board members are almost all converts themselves, and their status as Jews remains equivocal in the eyes of ultra-religious sects of Judaism.

My cousins are in a race against the clock. Their second son is nine, he loves shul and celebrating the chagim. And like his older brother, he is at the top of his class in Hebrew. But, unless his parents find a way of convincing the Sharon School Board that their second son should be allowed to continue learning Hebrew beyond the age of 10, he too will be removed from his class. And in the process, kicked out of a faith he loves.

So, who is a Jew? Is it someone born of a Jewish mother who does not identify with the religion? Or is it someone born of a Jewish father who does identify with Judaism? Is a Jew one who is born of neither a Jewish mother nor father but who has converted to Judaism? And does the conversion have to be an Orthodox one, or can it be Conservative or Reform?

I used to think a Jew was someone who through Jewish parental lineage or Jewish conversion was proud to be a Jew. But now I'm not sure.

Arguing because we are united

We Jews love to argue. Next to eating, arguing is one of our favorite national pastimes. But we don't argue because we hate each other.

By Hartley Lachter

We argue because we love each other, and like eating, arguing keeps us alive. Of all the topics which get us worked up into a confrontational frenzy, such as couscous versus kugel or the question of who is the messiah and who is not, nothing gets our blood boiling quite as quickly as modern Israeli politics.

The recent election in Israel is an excellent example of just how quickly current Israeli events can bring our tempers to the brink. Almost all Jews, whether they live in Israel or not, had a fairly strong opinion as to which candidate they favored. For weeks before the election Jews were pitting the merits of Likud against those of Labor and Benjamin Netanyahu against Shimon Peres. For a long time the din of conflict and acrimony among Jews over Israeli politics worried me. I figured that if the Temple could be destroyed because of "causeless hatred," what is to save the state of Israel from the same fate? Is raging argument not a form of such hatred?

However, something that a non-Jewish friend said made me change my mind. She commented that before she came to McGill, she had always thought of the Middle East as being some far off region that did not affect anything here. But when she got to school, she found herself surrounded by Jewish friends, both right wing and left, who cried when Yitzhak Rabin was killed and had a large student memorial service in his honor; who continued having memorial services for all of the people who were killed in the suicide bombings; and who were glued to the television every time there was a terrorist act in Israel, making statements like, "I was on that bus only a month ago. I hope that boyfriend is not on it today."

In a poignant and painful expression of the national unity which columnist Hartley Lachter writes about, hundreds of Israelis lined the Tel Aviv to Jerusalem highway to honor the coffin of slain Prime Minister Rabin on its way to the Knesset. [RNS]

She looked at me and said, "I've never known people who feel such a connection to things that are happening half way around the world."

That conversation opened my eyes to something I should have seen all along. Jews argue about Israel, the peace process and everything else, not because we are divided, but rather, because we are united. There is a unique national Jewish soul, a certain volksgeist, which seems to push us all to work and fight for the betterment of the nation, even though we may disagree as to what is the best path to take.

The assassination of Rabin scares me, because it shows that some Jewish people no longer care about the welfare of the nation as a whole, they simply care about advancing the cause of their own agenda through bullets and murder rather than through debate. Arguing shows that we care about who we are arguing with and what they think, whereas murder merely represents hatred.

The recent Israeli election, with all of its division, gives me hope, because it shows that we still care about each other enough to argue. As long as we keep debating and trying to convince each other of the wisdom of our visions of the future of the Jewish people, the national Jewish soul will continue to flourish.

The box in the attic

The story which you will read below is true, but some facts have been altered so that the privacy of the individuals concerned could be preserved.

By Rabbi Dorothy Phair

Mr. and Mrs. Hyde had been living in a small town in western Ontario for a number of decades. Known to be law-abiding and living the anonymous life of many, they decided that they wanted to move. They had a daughter, Helga Jones, who helped them with dismantling their old home and packing. With David, her son, aged 10, she took on the task of clearing the attic. In the corner stood a mid-sized box which, judging by the dust that covered it, had not been opened in many years.

Laboriously they removed the cover and found in it strange items: a silken white scarf with black stripes and fringes, some black leather straps with little boxes attached to them, and books, written in letters they could not read. But when they came to the bottom of the box there were books they could decipher. Jones' language skills enabled her to understand that this was a Jewish prayer book printed in Vienna in the early part of the century. Suddenly matters came into focus: the letters in the strange alphabet were likely to be Hebrew, and as for the scarf and the leather straps, they must be something of the same kind — perhaps religious items of an unknown type.

Naturally, mother and son asked the Hydes what this was all about. The simple question first brought on a silence and then, tears. It turned out that the Hydes had changed their name. Having survived two concentration camps, they had decided that if they would ever come out alive, they would be done with their Jewish past. Jones was never informed that she came of a Jewish family, and of course, David in turn knew nothing of his grandparents' past. The Hydes begged daughters and grandson to forget what they had found and to throw the box into the rubbish heap.

Angry and feeling betrayed, she told her parents that she was going to find out more about her indentity.

Through a friend's father, a letter was sent to the Canadian Jewish Congress, which in turn asked its director of community services to pursue the matter. There was an exchange of letters, followed by materials and recommendations for books, and eventually a meeting took place. By this time Jones had learned that going by traditional Jewish law, she and her son were still Jews. Having made that discovery, they went all out in reclaiming their heritage.

The Hydes, meanwhile, are unhappy and old fears have been rekindled.

But life finds its own way, and Jewish identity is something which is not easily shed. Sometimes it resides in one's subconscious, and at other times in old boxes in the attic. We belong to a people whose history will never be fully written. How many other "Hydes" are there, and how many of their offspring walk the earth unaware of their identity?

Jews of Europe face a dim demographic future

Bernard Wasserstein's thesis is unambiguously direct: the Jews are vanishing from Europe and within a few generations will disappear as a significant element on the continent.

By Sheldon Kirshner

The figures speak volumes. There were about 10 million Jews in Europe in 1939. The Holocaust, emigration, a surplus of deaths over births and assimilation have reduced the Jewish population to under two million for the first time since the 18th century, Wasserstein writes in his cogent new book, Vanishing Diaspora (Penguin, $40).

Wasserstein — a professor of history at Brandeis University — subscribes to a theory propounded by the late Georges Friedmann in a controversial book, Fin du peuple juif, published in 1964. In it, he argued that the solidarities that had bound Jews together in previous generations were dissolving. This process, Wasserstein declares, is now unfolding before our eyes.

•Jewish communities in Eastern Europe, once the backbone of European Jewry, have withered away, notwithstanding revivals in Hungary and Poland.

•Jewish emigration from the former Soviet Union is continuing apace.

•Judaism as a spiritual presence in the daily lives of most European Jews is becoming an irrelevancy.

Only one segment of the Jewish populace, he writes, has resisted these trends — the ultra-Orthodox, an insular and traditional group with a high birthrate.

In what appears to be an apt analogy, Wasserstein compares European Jewry to the Jews of China. During the 12th century, a small number of Jewish merchants settled in Kai-feng, where they maintained a separate identity for several centuries. Encountering little or no hostility from their Chinese hosts, they gradually absorbed the values and practices of the local civilization. By the early 20th century, they had merged into Chinese society.

"The Jews of Europe now face a similar destiny," observes Wasserstein, whose previous books include Britain and the Jews of Europe 1949-1945 and The British in Palestine.

Wasserstein, having read what seems to be all the literature on the topic, fleshes out his thesis in a convincing and readable style.

With regard to emigration, he tells us that 137,000 European Jews settled in the United States between 1945 and 1952, while upward of 50,000 went to Canada, Australia and Latin America.

The steady exodus was caused by a variety of reasons. Chief among them was the climate of uncertainty brought on by jarring episodes of state-sponsored anti-Semitism in Communist states like Romania and Czechoslovakia.

In the wake of the Holocaust, too, some of the survivors who could no longer cope with their Jewishness simply left the fold. A few, such as Israel Zolli, the chief rabbi of Rome, even converted to Christianity.

The issue of assimilation is central to Wasserstein's argument that European Jewry is tottering. He cites the fact that Soviet Jews were the most acculturated and assimimilated national minority (yet also among the most persecuted in terms of state anti-Semitism). He examines the Jewish community in France, where a demographic decline was nipped in the bud by an influx of North African Jews in the 1960s, but where the intermarriage rate rose to 64 percent by the mid-1970s.

In fixing his gaze on Britain, his place of birth, Wasserstein cannot be optimistic. From a peak of 410,000 Jews in the early 1950s, the size of the community has shrunk to barely 300,000 today. And the forecast is grim, given low birth rates.

Ironically enough, the community in Germany, bolstered by inflows from Hungary, Poland, Israel, Iran and the former Soviet Union, is growing.

But over all in Europe, the long-range prognosis is gloomy, at least in Wasserstein's view.

Displaced persons

Two of the films screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival were of special interest to me. The first, a documentary, dealt with displaced European Jews in the wake of World War II. The second, a drama, turned on a Jewish partisan in Poland who survives the Nazi occupation and makes a new life for himself in the post-war era.

I identified with these dated films because they reflected my own past and destiny. My parents were DPs. I was born in a DP camp. My father, a soldier in the Polish army vanquished by the Wehrmacht in 1939, fearlessly started anew after coming to Canada in 1948 with only a few dollars in his pocket.

Report on the Living, released in 1946, was prepared by the American Joint Distribution Committee (JDC). The 26-minute film is narrated by Edward Warburg, the then president of the JDC, who had just returned from a fact-finding mission in Nazi liberated Europe.

European Jews, he reports, are threatened by disease, hunger and cold. By means of resettlement and reconstruction programs, and through the shipment of food supplies, the JDC intends to assist them in regaining their dignity and their bearings.

Warburg proceeds to describe the JDC's humanitarian efforts in Poland, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Germany and France. The JDC established health clinics, spas and canteens, set up vocational workshops, schools and farms, donated Torahs to synagogues, provided small business loans to struggling entrepreneurs, and facilitated the flight of Polish Jews, scarred by the 1946 Kielce pogrom, to the U.S. military zone in Germany.

In addition to being a compassionate front-line report about the needs of the survivors, the film is a fundraiser. The JDC, as Warburg intones, requires $123 million to meet its obligations. I don't know whether it achieved its objective, but I do know that my parents and I benefited from its largesse.

Long is the Road, made in 1948 in occupied Germany, is billed as the first feature film "to offer a Jewish perspective on the Holocaust." It is in German, Yiddish and Polish.

The Yellin family, having endured the deprivations of the Warsaw ghetto, finds itself on a train bound for Auschwitz. David (Israel Becker), the oldest son, jumps off, dodges German bullets, wanders through a forest, stumbles upon a Polish peasant eager to betray him, meets another Polish farmer who helps him, and finally joins a partisan band. Meanwhile, David's bedraggled family arrives in Auschwitz.

After the war, David launches a futile search for his parents. In a DP camp in Germany, he falls in love with a German Jewish beauty named Dora Bercowitz (Bettina Moissi). They marry and begin to rebuild their lives. In a predictable flourish, David is reunited with his mother, Hannah (Bertha Litwin).

Rabbinic Reflections

By RABBI AKIBA LUBOW

In the double portion of Mattot-Masei, this week's parshah, our ancestors are in the 40th year of their wandering in the desert. It is therefore appropriate, as the people of Israel approach the end of their journey, and as they stand poised to enter the Promised Land, that the beginning of Parashat Masei recalls the stages of their wanderings over the past 40 years.

Why is this important? Is it not sufficient for the people to know where they are and where they are going? Why is it important to recall where they have been?

In providing this history of their wanderings, the Torah provides us with an enormously important lesson for the Jewish community of our day. It is not sufficient to know where we are and where we are going. We must also know and understand where we have been, because the very future of Judaism is dependent upon it. It is one of the most important lessons which we can teach our children and grandchildren.

The most obvious way to accomplish this is by teaching Jewish history. Whereas we often concentrate on the periods of persecution that are a part of our history (and must be taught), it is even more important that future generations know of the richness of Jewish history. If there are to be future generations of Jews, they must know that Jewish history is more than persecution, that ours is a history in which to take pride.

Whether it be the richness of the ethical values passed on during the period of the prophets, or the eternal values and way of life discussed and set down in writing during the Rabbinic period; whether it be the vibrancy of Jewish life in Babylon, or later, the golden age of Spanish Jewry, or yet later, the vitality of Jewish life in Eastern Europe, these are all stages of Jewish history which must be taught to future generations. We can only understand where we are and where we are going by first understanding that we are rooted in a Jewish past.

A less obvious, but even more effective way to accomplish this goal of transmitting a knowledge of our past to future generations is through the teaching and observance of mitzvot. For example, when a brit milah takes place, the parents are engaging in a life cycle event going back to Abraham and Sarah. Later, when youth don a tallit or lay t'fillin for the first time, they are creating a link with commandments going back to the Torah itself. When Jews pray, they not only engage in a dialogue with God, they do so in a manner and with words whose origin is in the Tanach, developed in Talmudic literature and transmitted and modified down through the ages. When Jews celebrate holidays, whether sitting down to the Pesach seder or building a sukkah, whether hearing the sound of the shofar in the fall or the sound of the Megillah being read in the spring, they are celebrating holidays with origins in the past, but with lessons for today and tomorrow.

By performing mitzvot, we learn that our history is a dynamic one, passed on from generation to generation, with each generation making its own unique contributions toward providing a past which can be built upon in creating a future.

As we read the opening portion of Parashat Masei — eleh maasei b'nei Yisrael (these are the stages of the children of Israel), let us all remember that there are few things we can do which are more important for creating a Jewish future than the task of remembering our past and transmitting knowledge of our past onto future generations.

What makes a place holy?

By RABBI ELYSE GOLDSTEIN

Tradition says there are two Jerusalems: the earthly Jerusalem, with all its faults, and heavenly Jerusalem, the ideal city, where holiness radiates from the very stones themselves.

But what makes a place holy? Jacob dreams of a ladder with angels and when he awakes, he takes a stone, pours oil over it and consecrates the place as Beth El. Today it is a desolate spot, a stone quarry.

Guest Voices

The rabbis say that when Moses was about to receive the Torah, all the mountains of the world vied to be chosen as the honored spot. So God took a clump of dirt from every mountain on earth and from those clumps Sinai was formed. After the Torah was received, those clumps of earth were returned to their places of origin. Sinai existed for only one brief moment and for only one unique purpose. Then it disappeared. Does holiness reside always where it once was, or must it be rekindled anew in each generation?

Perhaps we in the Diaspora, have the unique ability to make holy places for ourselves, because we cannot take anything for granted, because this building is not thousands or even hundreds of years of history, because Abraham didn't walk on the ground of North America. We can't rest on platitudes about place; we must be diligent, we are forced to make Judaism as powerful a spiritual fit for today's searcher as any other system of belief and action out there. We can't just "breathe the air" and feel holiness.

We may be guilty of making an idol out of Israel if we see Jerusalem as the destination rather than the departure point. Anywhere one finds wonder and awe is a holy place; anywhere one is enticed, enchanted, encouraged, chided, enabled, if only for an instant, to reach beyond ourselves to become touched by the divine is a holy place. We have to let ourselves find that place wherever we are. Failing to find it, we must put ourselves to the task of building it.

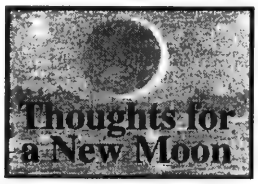
In the second century, Sura and Pumpidetha were known as the Jerusalem of Babylonia — and they produced the Talmud. In the 18th and 19th century, Vilna was known as the Jerusalem of Poland — and it produced countless scholars.

In our day, we must build the new Jerusalem of the Diaspora. I am not suggesting, God forbid, that we abandon Israel. I do not think we should see ourselves as the only Jewish light, but I do not think we can afford to see Israel as the only Jewish light.

As Rabbi Alexander Schindler has written, "We will never know who we are if we continue to use Israel as a fig leaf to cover our own nakedness ... For many Jews, the Land of Israel remains the sole touchstone of their Jewish existence. They have for too long been plugged into Israel as if it were a dialysis machine, a ... marvel that keeps them Jewishly alive. Many federations and foundations view trips to Israel as the sole guarantor of Jewish continuity, as a panacea for the seemingly intractable problems of intermarriage, non-affiliation and assimilation."

Indeed, we hear continuously that more trips to Israel will be a guarantor that young unaffiliated Jews who feel disenfranchised from the organized Jewish community will somehow be recharged into associating when they return. Israel should be seen as the outcome of Jewish commitment, not the creator of Jewish commitment. A complete transformation from uncommitted Jew to involved and active one just does not happen in two weeks, as powerful as they may be.

So let us send our kids to Israel — as a result of a lifetime of Jewish identity, not instead of. Let us support Israel financially — as a result of a deep connection to Judaism here, not instead of. Let us care passionately, debate passionately, love and criticize and even hurt passionately because we are passionate Jews. Then, maybe our teen trips and our money and our love and our passion can help bring the heavenly Jerusalem a little closer to earth.



Disagreement, not hatred

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The month of Av is beginning and once again our attention focuses on the ninth day of the month, the day upon which we believe the Temple in Jerusalem was destroyed and our nation was exiled.

Traditionally, we regard this day as one of potential danger for Jewish communities everywhere. It is important to view how the sages reacted to the destruction and what lessons we as a community can take from our history.

The Temple was the place within which we believe the Shechina (the Divine Presence) resided. With the destruction of the Temple, the question arose as to whether this Divine Presence continued to manifest itself among us. The rabbis addressed this concern by stating that the Shechina followed Israel into exile. If this is the case, why mourn the destruction of the Temple? If the dweller of the house has simply changed locations, why bemoan the change of house?

The answer to these questions speaks of a larger significance attached to the loss of the Temple. We did not lose a building — we lost a state of being.

The Talmud says that the Temple was destroyed because of "baseless hatred." Anyone who knows the political realities of the time preceding the destruction of the Temple understands the allusions to the many factions within Israel's community. Whether to rebel against oppression, whether to negotiate, how to understand the message of Scripture in light of the events of the day, these were all issues that divided the people to the point of turning against themselves.

It is interesting that the rabbis labelled these differences as "baseless." Or perhaps it was the "hatred" itself, rather than its "baseless" nature that must be emphasized.

As a people, we have never been univocal.

However, the distinction arises when the divisions, the questioning and the debating cross the line into the realm of hatred. We may disagree about our approaches to politics, religion, community or any aspect of our identities, but we must never allow these disagreements to escalate to the point of hatred.

When the rabbis use the term "baseless hatred," it seems an inconsistency. Anyone who hates will always find a reason to justify that hatred. The phrase is revealing because of its inconsistency: there are no grounds for Jews to hate Jews. The destruction of the Temple symbolizes not merely the loss of our independence, but also the introduction of self-hate.

The Talmud understands what disappears when hatred abounds. "From the day on which the Temple was destroyed, God knows no laughter."

If we as a community believe we can abide such emotions as "baseless hatred," history has shown there is an ultimate price to be paid.

Search bureau for missing relatives

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN
Special to The CJN

And ... Joseph made himself known unto his brethren. And he wept aloud; and the Egyptians heard, and the house of Pharaoh heard. And Joseph said unto his brethren: "I am Joseph; doth my father yet live?" – Genesis 45:23.

What is more moving, more stirring to the human soul than a reunion of parent and child or other family members after a lifetime of separation?

The biblical Joseph, having attained the highest civil post in Egypt, slips away to weep when the very brothers who had sold him into slavery come unknowingly before him, hoping to buy provisions for their elderly father and families in famine-starved Canaan. "I am Joseph; doth my father yet live?" he says, unable to contain himself any longer. Later, he rushes to meet Israel-Jacob in Goshen and falls upon his neck and weeps.

As when two highly-charged thunderclouds come together, a fundamental metaphysical energy is released when long-lost relatives meet. Pure or diluted by time, this reserve of psychic energy fuels the genealogical quest. While some researchers, particularly Holocaust survivors and their families, yearn to find living relatives, many others seek the names of kin from centuries past. For most, the discovery of the identity of a previously unknown ancestor is a kinetic, profoundly moving, almost religious experience.

Batya Untershatz of Jerusalem knows about such things, having tended to many interfamilial reunions. Most recently, she helped an Israeli man find his biological mother who, unmarried, had surrendered him for adoption decades earlier.

"She was in London and he was looking for her in Israel," says Untershatz. "First I found the aunt, and the aunt told me where the mother was."

When she first arrived in Israel from her native Vilna in 1971, Untershatz took a job selling watches and souvenirs in a department store. But like Joseph in prison, she was destined for greater things. Impressed with her facility with languages – Russian, Hebrew, Yiddish, English, Lithuanian, German, Polish – a customer suggested she apply to the Jerusalem-based Search Bureau for Missing Relatives, which was seeking an errand-person with multilingual fluency. She was hired and eventually rose to the top.

This year marks Untershatz' 20th as head of the Search Bureau, which the Jewish Agency established in 1945 to help displaced persons find missing relatives who might have gone to Israel. In slow periods, she handles about 300 requests a month. Not long ago, when Russian olim were pouring into Israel, she was getting more than 800 requests monthly. She boasts a success rate of 60 per cent.

"The more difficult it is, the more interesting it is," she says. "I don't like easy cases where you open your computer and find the name. That's too easy, that's peanuts. I like more difficult cases. I never take no for an answer. If I don't find the answer in my office, I'll go somewhere else to get it .... Once I found someone's family only by a connection with the mother's maiden name. I'm a Scorpio, and Scorpios make good detectives and psychologists. Those are skills that you need for this job."

Her basic resource is a computerized list of 1.5 million names of anyone who has ever contacted the bureau. As well, she relies on a microfiched list of all Israeli citizens from 1984, the year the Knesset passed privacy legislation blocking any subsequent release of such lists.

"They closed the source of information but I manage, believe me," she confides. "I have contacts and they give me all the information I need."

Many genealogists doing Holocaust research use the Search Bureau in tandem with records retrieved from the Hall of Names at Yad Vashem, which holds so-called Pages of Testimony for more than two million Holocaust victims.

Suppose that an Israeli submitted a Page of Testimony in 1956 for a relative of yours killed in Treblinka, and you're convinced that the Israeli is also your cousin. Despite the passage of 40 years, Batya Untershatz will help you find that person and his or her family.

The Search Bureau for Missing Relatives invites requests. Write to P.O. Box 92, Jerusalem 91000 Israel. Phone 972-2-621472(1), fax 972-2-202-252.

Sugarman reaches out to disadvantaged

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The disadvantaged women who use the services of Opportunity for Advancement (OFA) are not likely to live near the agency's administration offices on Eglinton Avenue just east of Bathurst Street.

That's why OFA programs are run elsewhere — in low-income areas in Mississauga, Etobicoke, North York, Parkdale, 519 Church St. and two locations in Scarborough, explains OFA executive director Rebecca Sugarman, a

Rebecca Sugarman

Sugarman herself grew up in Forest Hill, around the corner from where she now works.

"I did grow up with privilege," Sugarman admits. "I think, though, that my parents tried to give me an awareness of other things."

Sugarman's maternal grandmother, Irene Samuel, had also worked to help the disadvantaged. In 1934, she became the first national president of the Canadian division of National Council of Jewish Women.

Sugarman has been working with the underprivileged since her high school days, when she began volunteering.

Recently she participated on the Metro Community Grants advisory panel. A former executive director of the Barbra Schlifer Commemorative Clinic, which offers legal and counselling services for women victims of violence, Sugarman was also an original member of the City of Toronto committee on the status of women.

Since 1990 she has been running OFA, an agency geared to helping socially and economically disadvantaged women improve their situations. Most OFA clients are sole support mothers living in poverty. Other issues for them are being women of color, being disabled or chronically ill, or having experienced violence.

The largest chunk of OFA's annual budget of about $650,000 is provided by the United Way. The agency also receives government and private funding.

"We're considered a first-step agency," said Sugarman in an interview. "By going through our program, a woman on social assistance and at home with kids will be able to set goals for herself and figure out what she wants to do."

To that end, OFA offers a twice-weekly, seven-week pre-employment program called Preparing for Change. It also offers Women Under Stress to help women learn new coping methods, and Breaking the Cycle, a new program for women who have been abused.

Last year 327 women participated in OFA programs. The agency provided another 350 women with follow-up counselling and support.

Now that the Ontario government has reduced day care funding, it's even more difficult for mothers to enter the paid work force or pursue training, said Sugarman. OFA clients are provided with babysitting and TTC tickets to offset some barriers.

Probably the biggest barrier clients face, though, is lack of education, Sugarman noted.

"Oftentimes I think these women are really no different from me except that I've had opportunities," she said. "We try to reduce as many barriers as possible."

NFJA celebrates 36 years

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Though 150 of its 200 founding members have died, the New Fraternal Jewish Association (NFJA) is still playing a "small but significant" role in the life of Toronto's Jewish community.

That was the message from president Morris Biderman at the association's recent 36th anniversary celebration at the Lodzer Centre.

"Some people said we wouldn't last a month, others said we'd go a year at the most," Biderman said, recalling that its members broke away from the United Jewish Peoples Order (UJPO) after revelations in the former Soviet Union of the murders of Jewish writers, artists and doctors.

"We had three years of serious debate over the issue within the UJPO before we left," Biderman said.

Over the years, the NFJA, along with other secular organizations, suffered from the inability to shed the image that it was an immigrant and benefit society. "But we continue to have a loyal and satisfied membership."

Synagogues have been successful in attracting a larger membership by offering a wide range of religious and social services, Biderman said, and he congratulated them.

However, the NFJA remains a non-political home for the not religious who want to cultivate friendship and discuss public issues affecting the Jewish people in an open manner.

Among the NFJA's many accomplishmehts, he said, are the raising of $300,000 to establish the J.B. Salsberg Medical Clinic in Kiryat Yam in Israel, $200,000 for an addition to Baycrest Hospital and thousands of dollars for other charities, as well as the promotion of a revival in the Yiddish language.

Greetings and congratulations from Canadian Jewish Congress were brought by Ben Kayfetz, its former director of community relations.

Sam Lipshitz, one of the NFJA founders, was honored in recognition of his 35 years as editor of its publication.

Florence Marantz

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Ask Florence Marantz how long she has worked at the Bloor Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) and she has to stop and think.

"I've been coming to the JCC since I was 11 years old. My children attended nursery school here and continue to use the facilities as adults. My family has always belonged. We have good memories of all the time we have spent here. The years seem to blend together," she says.

Now director of programs, Marantz, a nursery school teacher by profession, is in charge of all adult and children's programming at the community centre.

"When I started doing some children's classes in 1979 or 1980, there were no other programs for children. I ran a few classes for adults to attend with their children and they became a real hit. There was a tremendous need for something like that in the area."

In 1985, Marantz joined the staff full time and admits it was a logical consequence.

"I live in the area and I am very much a part of the downtown Jewish community. My job is an extension of the rest of my life."

One of the programs she has developed, and of which she is particularly proud, is an after-school program for children in the area.

"We walk about 50 children from neighboring schools to the BJCC and they swim and take gym classes. It's fantastic for working parents. They know their kids are safe and taking part in healthy, fun activities.

"A very important part of my job is listening to members and trying to put their ideas into place. I am very visible and am always there for people to tell me what is and is not working well."

As she walks through the lobby greeting members of all ages by name, she says the homey atmosphere makes the centre a "wonderful place to work. We have a small staff and we all know everyone who comes in. We see children who started as toddlers in our adult-children programs enter nursery school, come to the after-school programs and become members on their own. We even have some second generation nursery school students. We are all quite proud of that.

"What is amazing is that we run all the programs, school and summer camps without any outdoor space. We're at the corner of Bloor and Spadina and it is difficult for members to find parking. They know however, that when they leave their children here they are in good hands. That outweighs any inconvenience."

Marantz sums up the Bloor BJCC quite simply: "We care, and people know it."

Greater Toronto Area

Canadian student has Jay Leno's cards

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO – Marnie Green is spending her second summer working on major American television shows as a volunteer.

Last year, she interned at The Young and the Restless. This year she landed positions with The Tonight Show with Jay Leno and The Bold and the Beautiful.

The 23-year-old Ryerson Polytechnic University student's first degree was a BA in psychology from York University.

"I really enjoyed psychology, but I just knew I would have to take radio and television. I'd always wanted to," she said in a telephone interview with The CJN.

Her job at The Tonight Show ranges from sorting newspapers for joke material to helping the assistant producers find information on the guests to typing Jay Leno's jokes on to cue cards.

At first, because of the shorter Canadian university semester, she was the only intern there.

"The others didn't start until the beginning of June. I was out there at the end of April, beginning of May. It's nice now having other students to work with," she said.

As an intern, Green receives experience in different areas of production.

"I get to watch everyone in action," she said, adding that she spends time observing in the production booth during both rehearsals and taping.

Green funds herself with money saved from the time she was 13. As well, she credits her parents for being very supportive "not just financially, but emotionally as well."

Although her resume is filled with Los Angeles references, Green would like to work in Toronto.

"At first, I wanted to move out to L.A. I'm not sure what changed my mind, but I have a lot of good friends and family in Toronto."

Green has lived in the Toronto area all her life. She graduated from Thornlea Secondary School and her family is a member of the Pride of Israel Synagogue.

The bachelor of applied arts in radio and television at Ryerson is a four-year program. Green will be going into her third year in the fall. She credits the idea of applying for an internship to Ryerson graduates who came to speak to her class.

"The graduates had worked in both New York and L.A. After they spoke, I just sent out my resume and cover letter. Then I called [the studio] back and back and back," she said with a laugh.

During the past school year, Green also volunteered on The Camilla Scott Show once a week.

Green will be returning to Toronto in July. For the rest of the summer, she hopes to find a full-time job in her field.

"I want to get my foot in TV or film ... I love writing, and casting interests me somewhat."

While she currently plans to finish her degree at Ryerson, she would be tempted to take on a full-time job in production, if she had the option.

"The industry is really large in Toronto. There are several opportunities to take advantage of," she said.

Visiting disabled veterans at their farewell party at Richmond Hill Country Club.

Adath Israel hosts Israeli veterans

TORONTO — Nine men and one woman took part in a group visit by members of Beit Halochem, the Organization for Disabled Veterans of Israel, recently hosted by Adath Israel Congregation of Toronto.

Each of the veterans, who ranged in age from 21 to 48, stayed at the home of a host family, and all the veterans and many volunteers participated in a variety of activities in Toronto.

"I finally feel good. This has helped my spirit. I haven't felt so cared for since my injury. I have not laughed or smiled in two years," said David (Dudu) Sharav of Ashdod, 21. "I think that this visit will really be the beginning of my rehabilitation."

The group spent two days at Deerhurst Resort, thanks to the generosity of Barry and Honey Sherman, and enjoyed a performance of Phantom of the Opera courtesy of Livent Inc. The veterans also visited the Ontario Science Centre and Canada's Wonderland, toured Ottawa for two days and shopped.

A Klezmer Conservatory Band gala concert was organized by Beit Halochem Canada, which not only fundraises for the rehabilitation centres in Israel used by the 47,000 war disabled, but also helps coordinate group visit programs in Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa.

Beit Halochem's New Leadership Division and Jerusalem chapter each organized special evenings to honor the vets and to get to know them a little better.

There will be another group visit in 1997. For further information, call Beit Halochem Canada at 416-488-7649.

Agencies help welfare recipients

TORONTO — The Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto (UJA Federation) and two of its beneficiary agencies are working together for the first time to help find jobs for Jewish welfare recipients.

UJA Federation, Jewish Family and Child Service (JF&CS) and Jewish Vocational Services (JVS) are conducting a six-month pilot project to identify the most employable recipients. UJA Federation will then use its network of contacts in the community to search for job opportunities on behalf of agency clients.

From an operating caseload of 500, JF&CS has targeted 25 people who may be eligible for the program. JVS coordinator Fran Giddens estimates that 20 percent of JF&CS clients are "job ready" and capable of competing for employment based on skills and experience.

"The federation," says Giddens, "will provide the leads through its broad donor base and personal contacts."

"We're not looking for charity. We're just asking for some doors to be opened," says Eva Landa, director of Supplementary Financial Assistance at JF&CS. "Getting more people off welfare and into the workforce will also mean significant savings for the community down the road."

The program was developed by an ad hoc committee made of agency representatives as a response to government budget cuts.

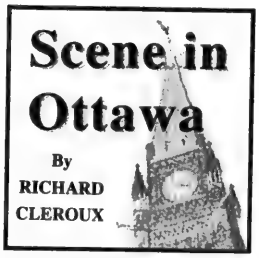
Wallenberg's fate still a mystery after 50 years



OTTAWA — Half a century later, the mystery continues. Where's Raoul Wallenberg? Is he dead? If he is, when and how did he die?

The final chapter in the life of one of the greatest heroes of World War II still has not been written. Was he executed? Did he die in a Soviet prison? Did he end up in Siberia? Could he still be alive today at age 83, having survived a horrible prison system this long?

Wallenberg was the young Swedish diplomat who saved 100,000 Jews in Hungary during World War II. He did it with impunity and bold abandon, passing out false "Swedish certificates of protection" to thousands of Jews, under the noses of SS officials. Wallenberg would shepherd his new found "Swedes" into giant ghettos, lodging them in huge converted warehouses, where the Swedish flag flew overhead in protection.

He bribed, browbeat and bullied Nazi officers and Hungarian gendarmes into releasing Jewish prisoners into his care, and then he would spirit them out of the country with false papers before they could get them into cattle cars. It was Schindler's List scenario on a grander scale.

Within a year, Wallenberg had saved more Jews from Hitler's Holocaust than all the governments of the world combined.

Wallenberg had been a 31-year-old Stockholm businessman from a millionaire industrial family (which also sold war materials to the Nazis) when he was recruited in 1944 by the U.S. Office of Strategic Services, a fore-runner to the Central Intelligence Agency, specifically to go to Hungary and help save Jews from extermination.

But he was also assigned to spy on the Nazis for the Americans at the Swedish embassy in Budapest.

The appointment was approved by President Franklin Roosevelt himself. Wallenberg's funds to operate came from the U.S. War Refugee Board.

Hundreds of secret CIA documents released earlier this year under the U.S. Freedom of Information Act to a U.S. News and World Report investigative team establish conclusively Wallenberg's role as an American spy, first against the Nazis, but later against the Soviets in the days after they swept into Hungary.

Wallenberg was quickly fingered, arrested, taken to Moscow and convicted without trial. He was jailed in the dreaded Lubyanka prison under Red Square, where he supposedly died two years later.

No death certificate on Wallenberg was ever produced. Everything has supposedly disappeared from Russian Security Service files. But today very few people really believe that.

The Wallenberg controversy began after the war, as Jews who owed their lives to him clamored to find out what had become of their hero. Wallenberg quickly became the U.S.S.R.'s most famous international prisoner.

In 1957, after much international pressure, Soviet Foreign Minister Andrei Gromyko issued a convoluted explanation that Wallenberg had died in prison 10 years earlier of what "might" have been a heart attack (he would have been 35). But no autopsy had been performed (unusual for so famous a prisoner). The body had unfortunately been cremated (but Lubyanka didn't have a crematorium) and everyone who had known him in prison had died (most convenient).

Today the Russians are admitting the Gromyko explanation was a fraud to get Wallenberg controversy off their backs.

The U.S. News investigative team which worked six months on the Wallenberg file in Russia last year came up with all sorts of people who say they saw Wallenberg alive in jail long after 1947.

Several former German PoWs put him in Vladimir prison, 120 miles from Moscow, in the 1950s. They found a talkative 72-year-old cleaning lady, Varvara Larina, who has worked at Vladimir prison since 1945. She remembers the tall, dark-haired, balding man in cell 49, the chronic complainer who was "always scolding, always unhappy", always demanding to see the officials.

Another group of Polish prisoners say they saw him later at a Siberian work camp in Bratsk, the tall man who spoke no Russian. All identified him from photographs.

There are reports, never confirmed, that the Soviets offered Wallenberg in a spy swap in the 1950s. The Americans were ready, but the Soviets said no, to protect their image of neutrality.

The Soviets insisted the Americans admit Wallenberg had been a spy. That would have justified jailing him. The United States refused. It was the time of Cold War politics.

Today the United States might make that admission. The Cold War is over. The new Russians might want to embarrass the old Communist dictatorship. The new Russian Security Service might want to nail the old KGB. The times have changed.

Canadians have a special interest in all this because Wallenberg is the only person in history ever to be given honorary Canadian citizenship, whether he is alive or not. That was done a few years ago by a unanimous vote in the Commons.

The answers are all in Moscow. "That's where the people who know what really happened are today," says Winnipeg lawyer David Matas, who has worked extensively on the Wallenberg file. He believes the "conspiracy of silence" may finally be broken.

"We owe it to someone who fought so hard for the human rights of others to look after his own human rights, whether he is still alive or not today," says Matas.

Wallenberg showed what one person could do against tyranny. He showed the heights humanity could reach. All humanity owes him its gratitude. Finding out what happened is a good way to start.

Judge's removal urged

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — In recommending his removal from the bench for misconduct, a Canadian Judicial Council inquiry concluded that Quebec Superior Court Judge Jean Bienvenue showed, "to say the least, a blatant lack of judgment" in stating that millions of Jews died without pain or suffering in gas chambers.

"Although the judge was aware of the Jewish community's reaction to his comments about the victims of Auschwitz, that reaction came as a great surprise to him," the 62-page majority report of the inquiry committee states.

Noting that Bienvenue later stood by remarks made during sentencing at a murder trial in December, four of the five committee judges found that his subsequent apology to the Jewish community was not an acknowledgment that he was wrong, merely an admission of "the inappropriateness of the analogy."

(Bienvenue reportedly made the comment to illustrate that the convicted woman was even more cruel than the Nazis.)

The majority report says Bienvenue, 67, "misused" his office in expressing personal beliefs about the Holocaust, as well as about women and suicidal persons, and to criticize jurors.

"We find that the judge has shown an aggravating lack of sensitivity to the communities and individuals offended by his remarks and conduct," and moreover, has shown no intention of changing his behavior.

The majority felt that Bienvenue is unfit to continue on the bench because he has undermined the public's confidence in him, but also because he "strongly contributed to destroying" its faith in the judicial system.

Bienvenue, Superior Court judge since 1977 and a Quebec finance, education and immigration minister before that, is the first federally-appointed judge to be recommended for dismissal by a public inquiry. The council, established in 1971, has conducted eight major inquiries, said spokesperson Marcia Pinet, but none recommended removal, although some of the judges under scrutiny resigned.

It was also the first time that a provincial attorney general and federal justice minister jointly requested such an inquiry.

Four of the five committee members ruled Bienvenue had breached "the duty of good behavior" under Section 99 of the 1867 Constitution Act and has "become incapacitated or disabled from the due execution of the office of judge ...

"We believe that if [Bienvenue] were to preside over a case, a reasonable and informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically, and having thought the matter through, would have a reasonable apprehension that the judge would not execute his office with the objectivity, impartiality and independence that the public is entitled to expect from a judge."

Dissenting member Chief Judge J.-Claude Couture of the Tax Court of Canada, in a 28-page report, argued to the contrary: "I am not satisfied that the evidence has shown that [Bienvenue] was manifestly and profoundly destructive of the concept of the impartiality, integrity and independence of the judicial role [criteria used by the inquiry]" to the extent that public confidence in his ability to judge is undermined.

Couture also stated he is not convinced that Bienvenue "intended to insult or revile women and Jews." What's more, he said, his remarks are open to "differing interpretations."

He observed that Bienvenue had never before displayed sexist or anti-Semitic attitudes, or otherwise done anything that could be construed as misconduct in a judge.

Film executive dies at 66

MONTREAL — Harold Greenberg, the high school dropout who rose to become a leader of the Canadian motion picture and television industry, died July 1 of pancreatic cancer. He was 66.

"No one individual has contributed more to the evolution of Canadian film and TV, and no Canadian industry executive is more respected around the world than Harold Greenberg," Montreal World Film Festival president Serge Losique said when Greenberg was presented with the festival's International Achievement Award in 1989.

Greenberg was chairman and chief executive officer of the entertainment conglomerate Astral Communications Inc., a multimillion-dollar diversified corporation that grew out of a single second-hand camera store that he and his brothers Harvey, Sidney and Ian opened in the 1950s.

The business grew into 120 camera and photofinishing stores across the country, but became better known in later years for its packaging and distributing of movies, television and video programming as Astral Bellevue Pathe. Greenberg was a pioneer in pay TV concepts and had controlling interests in the First Choice (now called The Movie Network) and Super Ecran networks.

Greenberg produced or co-produced almost 40 movie and TV programs, including Porky's, In Praise of Older Women, Maria Chapdelaine and the Canada-Israel co-production, Tell Me That You Love Me.

His company is also a major provider of technical services to the industry, such as post-production and duplicating.

Greenberg quit Baron Byng High School at 14 and began working in his uncle's second-hand shop on Craig Street. By 20, he had his own store down the street, selling used photographic equipment.

The business really took off in 1967, when the Greenbergs won the contract to operate all the film kiosks at Expo 67.

A diabetic, Greenberg reduced his day-to-day involvement in the business in 1993 as his health declined, naming his brother Ian president and chief operating officer of Astral. However, Harold continued to focus on planning the future of the company and its expansion.

Greenberg was a general philanthropist in the Jewish community and was particularly active with the Canadian Friends of Tel Aviv University. The Friends awarded him an honorary fellowship in 1985 for his family's support of the university's faculty of visual and performing arts, where they established the Abraham & Annie Greenberg Film and Video Centre in memory of their parents.

Greenberg is survived by Edie, his wife of 42 years; sons Stephen and Joel, daughter Anna-Sue and their families; and five sisters and three brothers.

kiss blind dating good-bye

It has happened to all of us. A well-meaning friend or relative sets you up on a blind date with someone who is "absolutely perfect for you." You arrange to meet, take the time to get ready and on the way over you allow yourself to think — just for a moment — that maybe this might be the one. But a few minutes after meeting your date you realize that the person is nothing like your friend described, that you have nothing in common, and that you'd have been better off spending the night at home. It's disappointing, frustrating — and it doesn't have to be that way!

INFORMATION IS KEY

The whole premise behind the Jewish Singles Registry is to provide registrants with all the information necessary to make informed and quality dating choices. Members get to view very detailed and comprehensive biography profiles on each other. Personality traits, hobbies, interests, community involvement, and even the reasons for joining the service, make up just a portion of the questionnaire. A photograph attached to each file completes the "picture". Members have been joining in record numbers, and with close to 1,100 registrants the selection of compatible biographies has never been greater.

YOU'RE THE BOSS

Perhaps the most attractive feature of the service is that members get to do the selecting for themselves. No match-making here! Members get to see for themselves beforehand who they would like to meet and can either select members to go out with, be selected by other members, or a combination of both. It's fun, safe and simple to connect with hundreds of other Jewish singles.

CONFIDENTIALITY IS TOP PRIORITY

Ontario communities seeking people to lead shuls

TORONTO — Some of Ontario's smaller Jewish communities, such as Kingston and Peterborough, are seeking part-time rabbis or people capable of acting as spiritual leaders of established synagogues.

Most synagogues in small communities do not have full-time rabbis because they cannot afford them, said Jennifer Turack, Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region director of Community Services and Youth Activities. Many of the shuls, however, hire part-time rabbis or persons to provide spiritual guidance during the High Holy Days and on other special occasions.

As part of its mandate, Congress is committed to preserving and strengthening Jewish life in communities throughout the province outside the Greater Toronto Area. Over the years, Congress has assisted communities in obtaining the services of rabbis, cantors, student rabbis or other qualified persons to provide spiritual guidance.

Many of the shuls in the smaller communities, Turack said, are not associated with international synagogue organizations — either because they can't afford the fees or because they don't fit into the denominational outline.

Jerry Cooper, co-president of Beth Israel Congregation in Peterborough, said his shul is seeking a part-time spiritual leader — someone to lead services during the High Holy Days and come once a month to lead services. The shul does not adhere to one Jewish denomination.

"If we build a strong Jewish presence, there is potential for further growth here," he said. There are about 60 Jewish families living in Peterborough.

Michael Hillel Robinson, president of Iyr-Hamelech, a Reform congregation in Kingston associated with the Union of American Hebrew Congregation, said his temple is also looking for a part-time religious leader.

Consisting of 56 families or units (as the congregation defines them), the shul is celebrating its 20th anniversary this year.

Robinson said that Iyr Hamelech is seeking someone to lead High Holy Days services and to come on 10 monthly visits to conduct services, visit Sunday schools and instruct those preparing for bar and bar mitzvahs.

Winnipeg youth recall fight against fascists

By MYRON LOVE
CJN Prairie Correspondent

WINNIPEG — About 100 mainly young people recently gathered at an anti-racist rally in Winnipeg's Old Market Square to commemorate a battle fought over 60 years ago between fascists and anti-fascists. In that fight, the fascists were thoroughly routed.

One of the speakers at the rally was Fred Narvey, an 83-year-old short story writer and Yiddishist, who participated in that fight.

On June 5, 1934, a group of 75 fascists, armed with clubs, knives and blackjacks, invaded Old Market Square near City Hall to hold their first public rally. They found themselves confronted by about 2,000 opponents.

"We surrounded them, Jews and non-Jews, workers, Communists and Socialists," recalled Narvey. "We knew it was important to stop the fascist march in Winnipeg. We surrounded them and began singing working class songs. They attacked us, but they got the worst of it."

The fight was over in 10 minutes and 13 of the fascists had to be treated in hospital. There were no more fascist rallies in Winnipeg.

In recent years however, the threat of right-wing extremism has once again reared its head in Winnipeg.

Helmut-Harry Loewen of the Western Anti-Racist Network (WARN), one of the rally's organizers noted that Winnipeg has become fertile ground for hatemongers in the past 10 years, citing as examples Bill Harcus, self-styled Ku Klux Klan leader; and Joe Lockhart, founder of the "European Christian Defence League," who has links to Ontario's Heritage Front.

He also referred to the upcoming trial of five neo-Nazis charged with the beating death of a man near the Legislature five years ago, because they thought he was gay.

"We are monitoring the case," Loewen said. "We want the courts to nail these guys hard.

"We owe it to our forebears to deliver a clear message to racists and fascists that we will not tolerate their activities," he said. "We all have to be on the front lines in the battle against hate."

"If we can create an anti-fascist wall, we hope that neo-Nazis won't dare show their faces here," said Yaron Walter of United Against Racism, another of the rally organizers.

Following the speeches, all those at the rally paraded through the downtown to the Law Courts Building to deliver their message.

Loewen reported that the rally organizers have also begun a campaign to have a plaque erected at Old Market Square commemorating the 1934 battle.

Cabinet approves massive budget cuts

Will affect most Israelis

By DAVID HARRIS
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The cabinet approved a Treasury plan for a massive budget cut last Sunday, after a debate that lasted more than seven hours. The Treasury had presented a comprehensive blueprint for slashing government expenditures in 1997 by NIS 4.9 billion ($1.633 billion US).

Foreign Minister David Levy, Health Minister Tzahi Hanegbi and Tourism Minister Moshe Katsav abstained in the final vote.

The document proposes a series of cuts, ranging from drastic reductions in child allowances, standing army salaries and old-age benefits, to extra medical treatment costs, and increases in public transport fares.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu described the measures as "painful but inevitable surgery," stressing that "this is only a partial step."

"Clearly Israel still has the needs of a developing modern society," said Finance Minister Dan Meridor. "However, the previous government's health, education and welfare expenditure added up to a sum that was beyond our capabilities. Hence the need for tough decisions which necessitated public courage. It would have been easier to be popular."

There is hardly a family in the country that will not be affected by the cuts, which will affect all sectors of the population.

The proposals include flat payments of NIS 10 for each visit to a doctor and NIS 20 for hospital outpatient appointments. Netanyahu said steps would be taken to ensure "a weak family" would not pay more than NIS 15 in any given month.

There will be a 50 percent reduction in child allowances for the first two children in a family with up to three children where family income is above a given level.

The major cut in the defence budget will affect retiring career officers, for an estimated saving of NIS 500 million; public transport fares will rise by 13 percent, other than for senior citizens; and employers will face a 3 percent hike in National Insurance contributions.

Hundreds of civil servants will lose their jobs, including 350 in public works, 100 in transport and an undisclosed number in the Employment Service.

The law which introduced a longer school day will not be implemented until 2000, instead of 1998. This equates to some 50,000 school hours being lost.

Lottery and other gambling wins of NIS 1,000 or more will now be taxed at 20 percent. Previously they were tax exempt.

Capital investment aid, which currently stands at 34 percent, will be slashed to 20 percent in first degree development areas. "Ninety percent of investments that arrive in Israel need no incentives," said Meridor.

Netanyahu was very keen to complete the budget cutting process before he leaves for the United States. "Economically, my visit to Washington will be less important than my visit to New York, and especially to Wall Street, where in essence I will be telling investors that they should invest in Israel, not because of government incentives, but because of its gifted people," he told journalists.

Cuts of NIS 350 million are also being proposed for the current fiscal year. These include NIS 90 million from agriculture, NIS 73 million from the Defence Ministry and NIS 19 million from education.

Overall, the hardest hit ministry is Defence, which has to make total savings of NIS 825 millon. That decision was taken as dozens of officers' wives demonstrated for a second day against cuts to regular army salaries.

Other ministries will also be severely trimmed back: Health will lose NIS 500 million; Construction and Housing will be cut 246 million; and the Finance Ministry will lose NIS 292 million.

Compensation possible for Hitler's slave laborers

By DANIEL DAGAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BONN — Germany's top court would not decide last week whether prisoners in Hitler's slave labor camps could sue the government for compensation.

The court said the case should be considered by lower courts, but reportedly did not offer any guidelines.

The Federal Constitutional Court in Karlsruhe handed down the ruling in April, though it was first published last week.

The decision follows a case in which 22 plaintiffs, all of them Jewish, filed claims of up to $14,500 (US) each because they were forced by the Nazi SS to work at a munitions factory while interned at Auschwitz from 1943 to 1945.

Some have said the ruling paves the way for surviving slave laborers to seek compensation in German courts.

But Saul Kagan, executive vice-president of the Conference of Material Claims Against Germany, said, "Until the full text of the decision of the German Constitutional Court becomes available and is evaluated, it is not possible to determine whether this decision will be of practical significance for Holocaust survivors."

About seven million slave laborers, many of them Jews, worked in Germany during World War II. In the past, individual companies have had to settle with victims of slave labor.

After the verdict, representatives of the victims urged the German Parliament to pass a law that would clearly recognize the slave laborers' claims.

Refugee issue confronts Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

One of the most vexing issues confronting Israel and the PLO in final status negotiations revolves around Palestinian refugees.

Mideast Analysis

The demand by the PLO that refugees should have a "right of return" to their former homes in what is now Israel is sharply at variance with an Israeli consensus that it must never be permitted to happen.

Israel's position transcends partisan politics, and therefore, Benjamin Netanyahu's policy toward the refugees will likely be the same as that held by Shimon Peres.

Israel opposes the wholesale repatriation of Palestinians because it would, in a word, be suicidal. If Israel admitted masses of refugees, the Jewish character of the country would be subverted, and a fractious binational state would emerge. In all probability, given their higher birthrate, the political balance of power would shift in favor of the Arabs and Jews would be relegated to being a minority in their own land.

Clearly, then, the "right to return" is out of the question, even though Israel is obliged to consider the issue in final status talks.

Israel believes that the refugee problem, which is both political and humanitarian, can be alleviated by resettling the refugees and their descendants in the Arab countries in which they currently reside, by upgrading conditions in refugee camps, by financial compensation and by strictly limited repatriation to Israel.

A resolution of the refugee problem, one of the root causes of tension in the area, is plainly in Israel's national interest. For if it continues to fester, embittering yet another generation of Palestinians, the chances of resolving the debilitating Arab-Israeli conflict diminish.

The problem, the flip side of which turns on Jewish refugees displaced from Arab countries, is rooted in the 1948-49 Arab-Israeli war. Zionist mythology holds that Arabs left Palestine voluntarily at their leaders' urging. Palestinian nationalists maintain that they were deliberately forced out in a brutal episode of ethnic cleansing.

Some Israeli scholars, like Benny Morris, are of the view that the truth is somewhere between these poles. Writing in The Birth of the Palestinian Refugee Problem, he observes that "it was largely a by-product of Arab and Jewish fears and of ... protracted, bitter fighting." He adds: "In part, it was the creation of deliberate actions by Jewish military commanders and politicians; in smaller part, it was the result of actions by Arab military commanders and politicians."

When the dust finally settled, the vast majority of Arabs who had lived in Palestine/Israel were gone, having been dispersed to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and neighboring Arab countries. Remaining behind in Israel were about 160,000 Muslim and Christian Arabs, the nucleus of today's Israeli Arab community.

A fresh wave of refugees was unleashed by the Six Day War, when thousands of Palestinians crossed into Jordan as the Israeli army conquered the West Bank and Gaza.

Statistics as to the total number of Arab refugees vary widely. The United Nations Relief and Works Agency (UNRWA) claims there are 3.1 million in the territories, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon. Israel disputes these figures as wildly exaggerated. Indeed, Israeli writer Shlomo Gazit contends that the real figure is one-third as large.

In December 1948, the United Nations General Assembly passed a resolution (194) calling on Israel to readmit the refugees or to compensate them for lost property. Israel agreed to take in 100,000 refugees, but retracted its offer in the face of continuing Arab hostility to its existence.

Since then, the refugees have figured prominently in each and every diplomatic demarche to defuse Arab-Israeli animosities.

•After the Six Day War, UN Security Council Resolution 242 called upon the parties to find "a just settlement of the refugee problem."

•The 1978 Camp David Accords established a committee to resolve the problems of Palestinians uprooted by the Six Day War.

• In its 1989 peace plan, the Israeli government called for an international effort to come to grips with the issue.

•Under the Oslo peace process launched in 1993, Israel and the PLO agreed to defer the problem for final status discussions.

Today, it is being addressed on a bilateral level by Israel and the PLO, on a quadrilateral level by Israel, Jordan, Egypt and the Palestinians and multilaterally by the Refugee Working Group, which, so far, has chaired five rounds of meetings headed by Canada.

The previous Israeli government, following talks with the PLO, concluded that the refugee problem could be solved largely through compensation rather than by resettlement in Israel.

It would not be surprising if the new Israeli government adopts this stance as well.

The Week in Israel

July 1

• Hundreds of thousands of Israeli workers reportedly staged a one-hour strike to protest a planned sell-off of government assets by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Israel Radio ceased broadcasts, ports and post offices were closed and banks opened late.

July 2

• Security sources reported that Israeli warplanes blasted a Syrian-backed Palestinian group's base in eastern Lebanon. The strike was intended as retribution for an ambush that killed three Israeli soliders last week. The air raid on the Fatah Uprising base was the first retaliatory attack since Benjamin Netanyahu was sworn into office as prime minister.

July 3

• A young leadership mission of 11 Israelis, under the auspice of the Israeli Labor movement, concluded a visit to the United States to learn about American Jewish life. The mission included dialogues and educational sessions with Reform and Conservative Jews, Jewish federations and national organizations.

July 4

• Within four years, all of Israel's 2,400 schools will have a modern computer lab, making it the first country in the world with so many computers in its educational system, according to Haim Computers in Education.

July 5

• The IDF is preparing for the possibility that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, together with Defence Minister Yitzhak Mordechai, will instruct IDF forces to redeploy in Hebron after the prime minister returns from the United States, Ha'aretz reported. Senior IDF Cental Command officials emphasized that the decision to redeploy has been made in principle, but that they are still waiting for the authoritative go-ahead.

JERUSALEM 3000 EVENTS

On July 1, the Jerusalem 3000 Photography Project opened. It will run until Nov. 28. Twelve world renowned and Israeli master photographers are showcased.

Israel & the Jewish World

Jewish Agency struggles for survival

The historical governance structure of the Jewish Agency and its partner, the World Zionist Organization (WZO), has drawn fire for its irrelevancy and waste.

That concern, as well as dwindling campaign dollars and a changing relationship between Israel and the Diaspora, have prompted chair Avraham Burg and others to make long-term plans for the Agency's radical downsizing and reorganization, and to redefine its mission.

In addition to the broad issues addressed by the assembly delegates, the Agency passed a resolution concerning religious freedom in Israel, tabled a resolution on the Joint Authority for Jewish Zionist Education and appointed a new director general.

When pressed to defend and explain the Agency's purpose, delegates invariably point to the success of the continuing aliyah from the former Soviet Union.

But many, including Burg, who sought but failed to win approval of the establishment of a strategic planning unit, are looking ahead to other roles that the Agency can play as a unique instrument of world Jewry.

"While focusing on this sacred mission" of aliyah, Burg said in an interview, "we have to prepare the ground for the post-rescue era."

Although many welcome the plans for change as long overdue, at the moment "the Agency is in a tailspin," as one North American delegate put it.

Given the poor global economy in the first half of this decade and continuing cutbacks in Western governments, it's not hard to see why the Agency faces such a crunch, says Allan Reitzes, executive vice-president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto. But the major reason, said Reitzes, who attended the Agency's meeting, is the ongoing immigration to Israel of former Soviets.

"The need for them has not diminished. In fact, it will continue" at the rate of roughly 70,000 a year, he noted. "And the income just isn't coming in as it used to."

There was a feeling of frustration at the assembly "because we're doing such important work" at a time when more money is needed, but less is being raised, Reitzes said.

And it's extremely difficult to keep going back to the well, in North America, where highly successful Operation Exodus campaigns were conducted in the early '90s for Soviet resettlement, because, he said, "the same message over and over loses its impact."

He said when the next fiscal year is factored in, the Jewish Agency will face a debt of $100 million. Diaspora federations that have spare cash will contribute to the $20-million emergency fund. Toronto will transfer $15 million to the Agency for 1995-96.

Facing $100 million debt

Reitzes pointed out that in addition to slashing its budget, the Agency will transfer to the government its Youth Aliyah program, a network of villages for needy and immigrant youth.

There was a "recognition" at the assembly that rescue and resettlement are still top priorities, said Steven Drysdale, executive vice-president of Montreal's FEDERATION CJA.

But delegates, many of whom Drsydale said were "skittish" over the Israeli election result and what it will mean for Jewish pluralism, passed a historic resolution calling on the new government not to tamper with issues like who is a Jew or Jewish religious freedoms.

As for Israel-Diaspora relations and fundraising, "we're going into a changing period. There is much desire on the part of [Diaspora] communities for a hands-on approach" and the targeting of donations to specific projects, instead of one big pot, Drysdale said.

It was clear, however, that many Diaspora delegates do approve of the Agency's role in rescue and resettlement and want to maintain it as vehicle for Jewish peoplehood, education and Israel-Diaspora partnership.

For many of the North American delegates, the highlight of the assembly and the best showcase for the Agency's expression of a Jewish voice was the resolution unanimously adopted, after a vigorous debate, in support of Jewish unity and calling on the Israeli government to preserve Jewish religious freedom as it now exists in Israel.

Although the word "pluralism" was deleted from the original draft of the resolution in deference to the modern Orthodox members of the assembly, its passage nonetheless was construed as a victory by supporters of non-Orthodox streams of Judaism.

The assembly also approved a resolution proposed by Burg to form a commission of representatives from the Orthodox, Reform and Conservative movements for ongoing consultations with the government on religious matters.

But the spirit of compromise, many here said, also was driven by an implicit understanding that not endorsing religious pluralism would threaten the fundraising campaign and the Agency by alienating non-Orthodox donors.

Meanwhile, the economic situation remains dire. The Agency has undertaken a plan to cut $500 million over five years to cover deficits caused in part by flagging fundraising campaigns by the UJA and federations, which funnel about $220 million annually to the Agency through the United Israel Appeal.

Next year's budget, proposed at $387 million and slated to be finalized in October, is down from this year's $450 million budget, mainly as a result of the transfer to the government of the Agency's Youth Aliyah program.

Clinton, Netanyahu meet in Washington

Palestinian state or any kind of negotiation on Jerusalem, both issues the previous Labor-led government was willing to address.

In a recent interview, Netanyahu said he would support Palestinian autonomy without sovereignty, which would enable the Palestinians to run all elements of their lives that cannot pose any security threats to Israelis.

On the stalled talks with Syria, Netanyahu has said he believes that it is possible to reach "sub-agreements" with Damascus and that he is not adverse to an interim solution regarding Lebanon.

But he has sharply attacked Syria as "a base for Middle East terror."

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported last week that Netanyahu had asked the head of the Mossad intelligence agency and the head of army intelligence to draw up a document detailing Syrian and Iranian ties to terrorist groups and activities.

All these issues are expected to be brought up in the Israeli leader's meetings with the head of the CIA and in an address to Congress.

Meanwhile, Netanyahu held talks with former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger, who stopped here on his way back to the United States from Jordan.

Meanwhile, parents of missing Israeli servicemen have asked the government to freeze the release of Palestinian prisoners within the framework of the peace process until more information is produced on the whereabouts of their sons.

The families of seven Israeli MiAs met last week with Justice Minister Ya'acov Ne'eman, their first such meeting with a member of the new government.

Kissinger: PM will learn peace is in Israel's interest

BY YOCHI DREAZEN
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – Furthering the Middle East peace process is necessary for Israel and Benjamin Netanyahu will soon realize this, former U.S. secretary of state Henry Kissinger said last week.

Speaking to reporters after visiting the grave of Yitzhak Rabin, Kissinger said: "What [Rabin] has started grew out of Israel's necessities, and I think any prime minister will come to conclusions that the process has to be continued. Of course, each leader has his own ideas."

Kissinger, in Israel to visit Rabin's family, met Netanyahu earlier at the prime minister's residence. He said he is confident Netanyahu would take a "constructive" message to Washington on his maiden visit this week.

"Israel and the United States have a common destiny, and their leaders have to come to express that common destiny," Kissinger added.

Explosives expert captured

By EVELYN GORDON
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – The General Security Service (GSS) has captured the man who supplied the explosives for three suicide bombings this spring, an affidavit to the High Court of Justice has revealed.

The affidavit was filed by the state in response to a petition by Ahmed Awada of the village of Dura near Hebron, who was arrested by the GSS on May 18 following information that he was attempting to obtain weapons and ammunition for Hamas.

Awada asked the court to order the GSS to stop depriving him of sleep and forcing him to crouch in uncomfortable positions for long periods of time. Since his investigation was stalled, the GSS agreed to the court's proposal that it issue both an interim injunction and a show-cause order against these methods. These orders were issued on June 11.

That night, however, another central Hamas figure named Raizek Rajoub told the GSS that Awada gave him a large supply of weapons just before his arrest, which he in turn transferred to Hamas activist Hassan Salameh.

Salameh, who was captured on May 18, was responsible for both Bus 18 suicide bombings in Jerusalem earlier this year, as well as the suicide bombing in Ashkelon in February.

Rajoub said Awada knew the arms were destined for Salameh and other wanted Hamas figures, and Awada had also promised to obtain additional weapons for them.

Since Rajoub did not know whether Awada had in fact obtained more arms or, if so, whether they had been transferred to other terrorists, the GSS decided it was urgent to resume questioning Awada immediately as this information might prevent other terror attacks. The state therefore asked the court to lift the interim injunction and, on June 13, the court agreed. However, the show-cause order was left in place.

Two days later, Awada confessed that he supplied "a large quantity of weaponry to Hamas activist Raizek Rajoub for Hassan Salameh," the affidavit said. "He also confessed that he promised to continue supplying weaponry, and even took certain actions to fulfil this promise."

Awada said the material he gave Rajoub included 21 explosive bricks, three mines, an electric detonator and fuse, and large quantities of ammunition of various kinds.

Awada also said that during the two months preceding his arrest, he hid various wanted Hamas figures in his house, including Salameh and Muhi Sharif. The latter was responsible for the Bus 26 bombing in Jerusalem last August, and is one of Israel's most wanted men.

Later, the GSS gave Awada a polygraph test on the subject of whether he possessed additional weapons which the GSS had not yet found. Awada denied this, but the polygraph indicated that he was lying.

Later still, Awada gave the GSS names of other Hamas weapons dealers, along with other details which, according to the affidavit, "could assist in frustrating future terror attacks which are now being planned."

Awada also admitted to assisting in other Hamas military actions, including some planned by Sharif.

However, the affidavit concluded, there is a great deal of useful information that could still be obtained from Awada, which could help prevent new terror attacks.

Hussein: Nothing has happened since anti-terror summit

By DAVID MAKOVSKY
Jerusalem Post Foreign Service

JERUSALEM – There has not been substantive follow-up to the U.S.-sponsored anti-terrorism summit in Sharm al Sheikh last spring, Jordan's King Hussein complained last week.

Rabbi Marvin Hier, dean of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, cited Hussein as telling his delegation in Amman that "nothing has happened as a result of the meeting at Sharm al Sheikh. We need concrete steps, and not photo opportunities, to deal with terrorism."

A meeting of foreign ministers was scheduled in Luxembourg as a follow up to Sharm al Sheikh, but was cancelled due to Operation Grapes of Wrath.

Hier said Hussein did not get into specifics, nor did he name countries involved in terrorism. He was joined in the meeting by Crown Prince Hassan and Prime Minister Abdul Karim Kabariti.

However, it is known that Jordan's ties with Syria and Iran have been poor, in no small measure due to terrorism. According to Arab press reports, Hussein brought 56 files to the recent Arab summit in Cairo and described terror infiltrations across the Syrian border.

Hussein and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu are expected to meet when the premier returns from the United States. Hussein met Netanyahu twice while he was in opposition.

Israeli heart surgeons honor Toronto colleague

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Cardiovascular surgeon Bernard Goldman, in Jerusalem last month for a medical symposium, thought he was going to a regular Shabbat dinner at the home of a colleague. As it turned out, 60 guests showed up for an evening planned in his honor, to recognize the University of Toronto professor's role in training Israeli heart surgeons over the past 20 years.

Because of Goldman, medical care in Jerusalem has "improved significantly," according to a certificate he received from the department of Cardiothoracic Surgery of Hadassah-Hebrew University Medical Centre.

Although "there's usually some new [surgical] procedure we're doing that they're not, technologically [Israelis] are as far advanced as any group I've ever seen," said the energetic 60-year-old in his office at Sunnybrook Health Science Centre, where he heads the division of cardiovascular surgery.

Among the new procedures Goldman has introduced to Israel was one involving the use of a pig valve. "It made the papers," he noted.

Although porcine valves were already used for heart surgery in Israel, these were prepared differently and Chief Rabbi Israel Lau provided special dispensation for their use, he said.

This fall Goldman plans to visit Israel for the eleventh time to demonstrate another new procedure. Among the surgeons he will be training is a West Bank Palestinian who trained at Tel Hashomer Hospital in Tel Aviv.

As a major teaching centre, Toronto attracts doctors from around the world for specialty and sub-specialty training. Because Israel is a small country, training abroad is a way to prevent professional isolation, Goldman explained.

But Israel has "more heart centres for their 4.5 million population than we have in Ontario for our 10.5 million," he added.

When Goldman began his practice in 1969, after completing fellowships in Bristol, England and Boston, cardiac surgery was on the cusp of significant change with the introduction of heart transplants and coronary bypass operations.

Heart surgery used to be a "horribly high risk procedure." Today bypasses are routine and surgery on patients in their eighties is not uncommon, he said.

But Goldman cautions his trainees against complacency. "The minute you [become] complacent, you're going to have complications. What we try to instill in the trainees is discipline and focus. We may talk, listen to CD's or kibitz, but we never lose our focus."

Pregnant women's nausea studied

TORONTO — The Faculty of Medicine of the University of Toronto is focusing on complications related to nausea and vomiting of pregnancy.

The Motherisk Program of the Hospital for Sick Children of Toronto is conducting an international study to monitor the health problems caused by severe nausea and vomiting in pregnancy, symptoms that affect more than 50 percent of pregnant women.

Most pregnant women are not aware of the risks to them and their babies that can occur as a result of these symptoms. The hospital is asking for their stories.

For one year, a research group directed by Dr. Gideon Koren will collect data in Canada, the United States and England to determine the consequences of nausea and vomiting in pregnancy and examine strategies to deal with the problem.

In Canada, an estimated 6,000 pregnant women are hospitalized each year due to the severity of those symptoms.

A recent survey of 310 women at Brigham and Women's Hospital in Boston found that as many as 10 percent of women opted to terminate their pregnancies to escape the symptoms.

To participate in this project by sharing their story with the research team, women who are suffering or have suffered from this condition can call 1-800-436-8477.

Talented cantors demonstrate beauty of chazzanut

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to the CJN

TORONTO — In Talmudic days, the qualifications of the chazzan were spelled out. "He should be a man free of transgressions and with a good reputation that has not been soiled even in his youth. He should be of humble and pleasing personality. He should possess a sweet voice and should be fluent in the reading of the Torah, the Prophets, and the Writings."

Further, the very word CHaZaN was taken as an acronym for CHacham, a man well versed in the Torah; Zakayn, at least 30 years of age and wearing a flowing beard; and Nasuiy, married.

Reclaiming Our Tradition, the gala cantorial concert that the American Conference of Cantors and the Guild of Temple Musicians presented at the Ford Centre in North York recently, visibly transgressed at least one of these rules, since the evening was almost perfectly balanced between male and female cantors.

Few female voices, it has been noted, can use certain expressive devices, such as the krechts or little sobs that the male cantor evokes. It has been observed that where the male cantor exults in heroism or pathos, his female counterpart provides instead a sweetness and delicacy, interpreting the drama of prayer in her own way.

That's precisely what Cantor Deborah Staiman, for example, did with Hineni, the chazzan's supplication written by Meir Finkelstein. A former Torontonian and student at Holy Blossom Temple, Staiman is now a cantor in Miami. One of the few soloists to perform without resorting to sheet music, she was able to produce a full emotional range that proved once again that there is no finer instrument than the human voice.

But it's unfair to single out just one performer from this talented roster, as each demonstrated in his or her own way that chazzanut, or cantorial music, is primarily an expressive and emotive art. The program consisted of recovered gems from master synagogue composers such as Israel Alter, Max Wohlberg, Leib Glantz and Jacques Fromental Halevy, who understood this only too well.

These compositions are not songs that one hears every day, either in or out of the synagogue. Some of the pieces, especially ones with choir and organ accompaniment, such as Tov Lehodot (composed by Zavel Zilberts, sung by Cantor Robert Abelson of New York), sounded more like selections from a southern evangelical radio hour, except that they were in Hebrew.

That's not to diminish the high spirituality and purity of the music, only to acknowledge the many secular influences that have shaped it.

The premiere of a new work, by Milton Barnes, Ark of the Covenant, proved to be the remarkable centrepiece of the program and a sharp contrast to the other 16 musical selections. Instead of paying homage to Jewish liturgical music of the last two centuries, the Toronto composer expropriated the rich ancient sounds of biblical times – harp, timbrel, cymbals, drums, horns, shofars – and wove them into a wondrous narrative fabric drawn from Samuel II.

As the opulent music sounded, a troupe of dancers, choreographed by David Earle, enacted the biblical story of the death of Saul and Jonathan, and the return

Young artist tackles contemporary issue

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — What does a 20-year-old artist have to say on pastel board or canvas? Plenty, if he is Amir Pichhadze. And with remarkable insight.

The Israeli born Pichhadze came here eight years ago. Until now, his father Jacob, a significant painter and master of pastels, has been his principal teacher.

"I taught him technique," Jacob says. "He will take it from there."

As he hones his skills under his father's direction, young Pichhadze discovers his own concepts.

A Commemoration of a Jewish Tragedy, displayed recently at a juried exhibition in the Leah Posluns Theatre, is a searing probe into the death by gunfire of Israel's late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin at the hands of a Jewish assassin — the enemy from within.

Seen in the aftermath of the murder, a grieving man crouches, head bowed, before Rabin's flag-draped coffin with a broken Magen David representing unity gone awry. A portion of the flag is wrapped around the man's legs and covers his feet. His hands are bloodied and behind him is a blood-spattered copy of Shir Lashalom (Song of Peace), which Rabin had at the moment he was killed. An obvious bullet hole is a reminder of the method of assassination.

A Commemoration of a Jewish Tragedy* is a searing probe into the death by gunfire of Israel's former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

A Jewish Tragedy

The man is the Jewish People, torn by political and religious strife. He mourns the death, yet the infighting marks him as it does all those who cannot or will not come to peaceful terms with their differences.

The song sheet is colored in reverse, white lettering on a black background to accent the darkness of the act and its consequences. But one corner, curled forward, pristine white against the sky, signifies a glimmer of hope. Pichhadze's youthful optimism?

In the surrealistic Reward for Virtue, the artist depicts a balance between the good and bad that are in all of us, portraying the good struggling over a barrier, hovering between light and dark and eventually passing through a narrow opening to emerge triumphant.

Pichhadze uses pastels or oils according to the subject, he says, but he leans toward pastels.

Just out of high school, he has enrolled in Fine Arts at York University and begins classes in September.

How will he reconcile what he has learned from his father with the experience that lies ahead?

"I'll keep an open mind," he says, ready to meet the challenges of computer graphics, which are "new to me and my father."

This Merchant tackles anti-Semitism head on

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

STRATFORD – No matter how hard directors try, they cannot escape the anti-Semitism in The Merchant of Venice. And no matter how tempted they may feel to be politically correct, Shakespeare's text cannot be changed.

But Marti Maraden, director of the 1996 Stratford production tackles the anti-Semitism head on.

Maraden sets the play in a pre-World War II Italy heavily infested with fascism. A young, modest Bassanio seeks a loan from the merchant, Antonio, in order to woo the wealthy Belmont heiress, Portia. Antonio, unable to provide the funds, offers a loan from a third party, the Jewish moneylender, Shylock (played by Douglas Rain). Shylock agrees to the loan, but on the condition that if Antonio is unable to pay it back, he must give Shylock a pound of his flesh.

The modern setting works well, as the period in which it is set is known for its anti-Semitism and intolerance. Yet the simple stage set and costumes create a feeling of familiarity for the audience. The open cafe where many of the scenes take place is comparable to the outdoor cafes of today. When, in one scene, a Jewish man is turned away from dining there, the situation hits almost too close to home.

Maraden plays with her audience's emotions, and when the characters insult and belittle Shylock, viewers are caught between siding with the protagonists and siding with the villain.

And there is no getting away from Shylock's villainy. When he demands that Antonio keep his bond, he is merciless and appears as a "greedy Jew."

In many ways, though, this Shylock is protrayed as a victim of circumstance. Since he has lost his daughter to intermarriage and has dealt with constant anti-Semitism, his outburst against Antonio is almost understandable.

But in addition to the circumstances, Shylock is not a clear villain because of the humanity Rain brings to him. When Shylock is first introduced, he is clean, poised and confident. Dressed in a business suit and fedora hat, he doesn't appear different from his non-Jewish counterparts.

When he is later crushed by the news of his daughter, he delivers the famous "Hath not a Jew eyes?" speech through genuine frustration and grief. Rain's Shylock is well rounded – a human not a stock character.

The combination of the setting and Rain's performance were so effective that at the end, many gasps were heard from the audience as Shylock was ordered to convert.

Other notable performances include Susan Coyne, as the witty, playful Portia and Michelle Fisk as her maid, Nerissa. These two women provide some satisfying and hilarious scenes, their comic relief providing a balance to the intensity of Shylock's story. In many cases, both women outshine their characters' romantic interests.

If nothing else, this year's Merchant shows that there are many sides to this complicated story, none of which can be ignored. The audience is left knowing that Shylock was wrong to try to kill Antonio, but they are disturbed by his punishment. While Shakespeare's intent may have been to create a light hearted comedy, in the present day this play bears far more weight.

The Story of J

She lived in Jerusalem almost 3,000 years ago, in the time of King Solomon and his hapless son and successor, Rehoboam. A contemporary of the historian who chronicled Solomon's court, she wrote in the Phoenician-Old Hebrew script, probably using a reed pen on sheets of papyrus that were later glued into scrolls.

Known to modern biblical scholars only as J, she was one of history's great writers, comparable in imaginative and rhetorical scope to Homer, Dante, Chaucer, Shakespeare, Cervantes and Tolstoy.

Or so asserts American literary critic Harold Bloom in his study The Book of J (1990), which contains a stark translation by David Rosenberg of J's reconstructed text. Bloom embellishes the secular theory that the Torah had multiple authors and redactors, by presenting a literary interpretation of J that opens with the startling proclamation that this greatest of Jewish writers was a woman.

It was in the 19th century that German exegetes first noted various pronounced stylistic differences in the Pentateuch and assigned authorship passage by passage to a number of imagined authors. Although it contradicts the normative Jewish tradition that the Torah was handed down at Sinai, some Jewish thinkers, including Bloom, have furthered this conception of the Torah as a brilliant literary patchwork quilt stitched together over centuries.

Purportedly the author of much of Genesis and Exodus, J is defined by her consistent use of the Tetragrammatonic name of God and by her bold dramatic irony and supreme narrative inventiveness. According to Bloom, J was not attempting to compose a sacred text when she reworked age-old legends about the Creation, the Flood, the patriarchs, Joseph and Moses. Highly erudite and sophisticated, she was a product of the Solomonic enlightenment whose works were censored, revised and abrogated by a series of later hands.

To understand her works, Bloom insists, one must first strip away the heavy varnish that overlays them.

Characterizing J as possessing a Shakespearean narrative ingenuity and an ironic outlook worthy of Kafka, Bloom assesses each of her literary creations, from Adam and Eve to Moses, boldly culminating with J's depiction of God. Unperturbed that this approach contravenes the Maimonidean precept that God is essentially unknowable and indescribable, Bloom sees in J's humanistic conception of God an impish child who fashions the first man from the dirt as though shaping mudpies, and who capriciously, possessively, digs a grave for Moses with his own hands at a spot that no one will ever find.

J has no villains or heroes, Bloom says, only heroines such as Tamar, Rebecca and Rachel, each of whom outsmarts a man for her own shrewd end.

Of all her characters, Bloom says, she shows the greatest feeling for Joseph, who was for her a surrogate for David; both are highly charismatic, charmed figures who win glory for Israel. Having seen the fragmentation of the Kingdom under Rehoboam, J supposedly yearned for a return to that past glory.

J was most conversant with the history of Solomon's court and not of remote events like the Exodus, Bloom notes. "Since I date J in the generation after Solomon, who died in 922 BCE, she was writing of events a full three centuries before her own time, or about as far back as the Cromwellian revolution in relation to current Great Britain," he writes.

In his most recent work, The Western Canon: The Books and Schools of The Ages, Bloom categorizes the 26 most important books of Western literature into four categories — theocratic, aristocratic, democratic and chaotic.

Not surprisingly, he elaborates on his caricature of J by suggesting that she was actually Bathsheba, the Hittite woman taken by David who became Solomon's mother.

This, he argues, would explain J's "ironic presentation of the Hebrew patriarchs and her fondness both for some of their wives and for such female outsiders as Hagar and Tamar."

Superbly ironic and audacious, Bloom's interpretation seems entirely in keeping with the J that he has fashioned for us. Whether he has overstepped our willing suspension of disbelief is immaterial. What matters is the refreshing boldness and originality of his insight and his formidable challenge to us to see these very old subjects in a very new way.

of the Holy Ark to Jerusalem, where King David is chastised for his crude public behavior. What a lush partnership was Lawrence Cherney's oboe and Erica Goodman's harp! The ebullient 12-member troupe also seemed equal to interpreting Barnes' rhythmic score, itself a tribute to the city of Jerusalem on the 3,000th anniversary of King David's arrival.

Besides the soloists, the Guild of Temple Musicians choir, conducted by Cantor Benjamin Maissner, seemed in wonderful voice, even if at times certain members seemed too attentive to their sheet music, neglecting the dramatic tool of eye contact.

Special mention must be made of percussionist Russell Hartenberger, pianist Joyce Rosenzweig and organist Karen Rymal. And thanks go to the two musical groups that brought such a wealth of talent to Toronto on the occasion of their 43rd annual convention.

The Land of Enchantment

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

SANTA FE, N.M. — Mention New Mexico and folks may think of Roswell, site of the covered-up (at least according to X-Files fans) post-war UFO landing, or perhaps Los Alamos, where top American scientists plotted the ultra-secret atomic bomb in 1945.

But the state is also known as the Land of Enchantment, at least on licence plates and memorabilia, and that's no secret.

There's also a fascinating, almost haunting Jewish presence here, but more about that later.

There are few places in the United States (Louisiana being one exception) which offer the traveller such distinctive geography, cultures and ambience. New Mexico has developed into a mix of old, New Age, Indian and Spanish that is at once charming, magical and mysterious. It's like combining Arizona with Mexico, and throwing in the quirkiness of Southern California.

It is chiefly northern New Mexico that beckons, with its Indian pueblos, pink and purple-dotted sagebrush mountains and valleys, and adobe everything. It's said too that there are more art galleries in the north than there are people. After a few days, one begins to believe it.

Santa Fe actually lives up to its PR. Here, history resonates, but not so loudly as to interfere with recorded New Age pipes, chimes and whale sounds wafting from nearly every shop and cafe. Founded in 1611 as a Spanish outpost, Santa Fe boasts churches, missions and hotel facades right out of a Clint Eastwood western. There's also a distinct French influence in some of the architecture (the rare, non-adobe variety).

Although it is a state capital, you can hear a pin drop on the leafy side streets. And unlike a lot of similar sized U.S. cities, there's no seediness, no skyscrapers, no neon liquor and gun signs, and virtually no litter. The locals would like to keep it that way, but Santa Fe is one of the fastest growing communities in the country.

Walking tours of the downtown core are recommended. Art galleries brimming with local, color-splashed paintings and pottery tend to be clustered in one area of town (Canyon Road). As for restaurants, it's best to stick to southwestern fare. Prepare yourself: they put blue corn in almost everything.

A good idea is to rent a car and drive north to Taos, an unspoiled, small town that's big on the arts scene. (A road sign in nearby Ranchos de Taos touts the B'nai Shalom Havurah). On the way, guided tours of Indian pueblos (comparable to reservations) give the visitor a fascinating glimpse into how native peoples lived long before the hated colonizer Christopher Colombus showed up.

About 50 families are members of the Los Alamos Jewish Centre.

A trip to Abiquiu to see the Georgia O'Keeffe house is worth the detour, as is a hike through the breathtaking Bandelier National Monument, where the intrepid may climb rickety ladders to peek into the cave dwellings of the Anasazi Indians who lived there, condo-style, from the ninth to the 15th centuries.

Los Alamos banks on its fame as the place where the A-bomb was developed in the top-secret Manhattan Project. (The bomb was actually detonated in the desert 200 kilometres to the south). At the local museum, there's an excellent exhibit on daily life in the 1945 scientific community, complete with declassified correspondence with the Pentagon.

At the Los Alamos Jewish Centre, Rabbi Jack Shlachter leads about 50 member families in services and programs. The volunteer rabbi is a full-time physicist at the Los Alamos National Laboratory, a war-era holdover that today employs 10,000 people. He came to the sleepy town as a grad student in 1979 and was ordained a year ago.

Jewish life in New Mexico, while not obvious, is everywhere. Albuquerque has several synagogues (as well as a Chabad presence) and a full array of services. There are shuls in Santa Fe, Roswell, La Jara, Carlsbad and Las Cruces.

But most alluring is the growing research into the existence in New Mexico of Conversos, or so-called crypto-Jews — descendants of Marranos who migrated north from Mexico. More and more non-Jews here, apparently, are unearthing their Jewish ancestry. More on that in a future issue.

In the meantime, a well-visited site in Jewish cyberspace is the Southwest Jewish Archives, with its information on Jewish pioneer families who settled the state in the 1880s. The address, via The Link, is http://www.swcp.com/thelink/.

President's Choice in Israel

By ADELE ROSS SLEPKOV
Special to the CJN

JERUSALEM — President's Choice has come to Israel.

The launching of the popular Loblaws line of grocery products in Israel was timed to coincide with the opening of the Jerusalem branch of the Greenberg's Superstore chain.

Giora Sage, Greenberg's director general, said once the Canada-Israel free trade agreement is signed [expected to be in late 1996 or early 1997] the chain will import over 2,500 Canadian products to Israel including housewares and cosmetics.

"Greenberg's elected to begin with President Choice (PC) products because of their quality and value," Sage said.

Over 120 PC products are being imported, from cereals to disposable diapers. The Loblaws-Greenberg agreement is said to be worth around $2 million.

The opening of the 50,000-square-metre Jerusalem store was marked by festive displays of Canadian and Israeli flags and was attended by Canada's ambassador to Israel David Berger.

Henrich fifth pick in OHL player draft

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It wasn't exactly the first day of training camp, but two old pros took the occasion to offer some helpful advice for the up-and-coming youngster.

"It's a long road [ahead] ... Get stronger, don't get too high or low. Every day is a new day," said the former NHLer.

"You seem to like the rough going, so strengthen your neck," said the second veteran. "You may have to fight to establish yourself, get a reputation," he added.

The advice was directed at 16-year-old Michael Henrich, a strapping 6-foot-3, 190-pound right winger who was recently drafted in the first round, fifth overall, by Barrie Colts of the Ontario Hockey League (OHL) in its selection of midget players.

The advice came from two veterans of the professional sports wars — Brian Wilks, a 1984 second round pick of the Los Angeles Kings, and Gerry Sternberg, a hard-nosed multi-sport athlete who played for a variety of teams in the CFL from 1966 to 1973.

The occasion was an adult education program at Beth Sholom Synagogue organized by local sports maven Monty Charness. Joining Wilks, Sternberg and Henrich as Charness' interview guests was basketball centre Morrie Herman, a five-time participant in the Maccabiah Games.

While for Wilks, Sternberg and Herman, the evening was a spin down memory lane, for Henrich the talk was about current achievements and future goals. Henrich, who played last season for Wexford Raiders Midgets, recently returned from an under-17 camp in Kitchener that brought together the top 88 skaters from across Ontario.

Though he had a minor injury for part of the camp and missed most of the intra-squad games, Henrich got into the last game and notched a hat-trick. He hopes to make the team and represent Ontario at an international tournament in Red Deer in December that will see provincial teams face off against opponents from the United States, Russia, Sweden and Finland.

Although he scored 110 points in 70 games last season for the Raiders, Henrich considers himself a defensive player who likes to bump and grind. "[The heavy going] doesn't bother me at all ... Yeah, I like it," he said.

Henrich said his father, Jim, stresses defensive play, thinking "not many players do it. If I can do that, I'll get noticed."

Bert Templeton, coach and general manager of the Colts, certainly noticed Henrich. Templeton said the Colts were impressed by Henrich's character and solid family background. In addition, they believe he has a "tremendous upside with no major weaknesses."

Michael Henrich

Henrich is big, has good hands and a great shot, and his skating is outstanding. In addition, he's intelligent and has the ability to read a play as it's developing, Templeton said.

Henrich has been a top player ever since he first laced up his skates as a 6-year-old. He scored six or seven goals (he's not sure) in that first game in a Thornhill house league and went from there. He played midget hockey as a 15-year-old against boys 16 and 17 and when he was a peewee, his Thornhill team won the Esso Cup.

Prior to being drafted by Barrie, Henrich also considered seeking a university scholarship. He choose the OHL because the league offers a full scholarship to Canadian universities for players who never sign a pro contract, leaving open his education option.

Henrich plans to spend the summer golfing, working with weights and attending a hockey school in Minnesota.

His first regular season game falls on Sept. 22 — which also happens to be Yom Kippur. A former student at Har Zion Hebrew School, Henrich is already planning to pass on his first junior game. Clearly he believes there are some nights even more important than opening night.

* * *

When he was drafted in the second round, 24th overall in 1984 (the year Mario went first), Wilks was at the Montreal Forum and was excited to meet the Kings braintrust that included Rogie Vachon and Pat Quinn.

At his first training camp in Victoria, he was "in awe" of his teammates, but quickly realized it was time to get down to business. Camp was gruelling, with six hours a day of on-ice practice accompanied by stretching and weightlifting.

A finesse player, Wilks led the team in scoring during the exhibition season with five points in four games, playing on a line with perennial King Dave Taylor. He played about 50 games that first year but was later sent down to the minors.

"That's tough, going from the NHL to the minors. All of a sudden, you're doing things second class," he said.

He was dispatched to New Haven of the American Hockey League (AHL), where he was coached by Robbie Ftorek, and then went on to Edmonton, which was in the midst of its dynasty years.

"I was really impressed with these guys. There was a different attitude, a winning attitude," he said. "The guys really listened to Mark Messier. Everybody looked up to him."

With the Oilers' strength down centre ice, it's no surprise Wilks was sent to their farm club in Cape Breton. From there it was on to Muskegon in "the I" for three or four months, which at that time was considered a level below the AHL.

After five years in the pros, Wilks, who had suffered knee and shoulder injuries, decided to call it a career. He'd always been small by pro standards and recalls that in his first year as a 16-year-old junior in Kitchener, he weighed 150 pounds.

* * *

Like Wilks, Sternberg was a lightweight in a sport played by heavyweights. The 5-foot-10 running back/defensive back played between 165 and 175 pounds.

Born in Russia, Sternberg grew up in Toronto and attended Bloor Collegiate. He was scouted for college by Tom Watt, who went on to be an assistant football coach for the University of Toronto Blues and later was NHL coach of the year with the Winnipeg Jets. At the U of T, Sternberg played football, baseball and basketball.

He was a first-round pick of Edmonton Eskimos but was dealt to Montreal. After some ups and downs, Sternberg eventually ended up with the hometown Argos during their glory years, when Leo Cahill coached a lineup that featured Jim Stillwagon, Bobby Taylor and Joe Theismann.

He described one particularly memorable run-in with Taylor after he knocked away a pass intended for the hot-tempered receiver. Taylor turned around and smacked him in the face. A few plays later, when Taylor was going for a pass, Sternberg made a bee-line for the receiver and clotheslined him, without even attempting to go for the ball. Cahill was impressed with his tough-as-nails, won't back down approach, Sternberg recalled.

Although he was traded by the Argos before their near-miss Grey Cup experience in 1971, he was with the Tiger-Cats when they won the championship in '72.

Slain athletes' families seek IOC recognition

By FAYE BITTKER
Special to The CJN

PHILADELPHIA — The families of the 11 Israeli athletes slain at the 1972 Munich Olympics have written to U.S. President Bill Clinton, asking him to intervene on their behalf with the International Olympic Committee (IOC).

As the world prepares to celebrate the 100th anniversary of the modern Olympic Games, "the IOC refuses to recognize the 11 victims, claiming this would be a political act," the families of the Munich victims wrote to the president.

"We thought that since the games were taking place in Atlanta [Clinton] might be willing to help us," Ankie Rekhess-Spitzer said in a phone interview from her home in Tel Aviv.

Rekhess-Spitzer was 26 when her husband, fencing coach Andrei Spitzer, was murdered during the attack by Black September Palestinian terrorists.

She and Ilana Romano, whose husband, weightlifter Yosef Romano, was also among the dead, have been leading the battle with the IOC to gain recognition for the fallen athletes.

For the past two decades, the seven widows have tried to reconcile their losses with what they consider to be the callous response of the IOC.

The world watched in horror when eight Palestinian terrorist entered the Olympic village on Sept. 5, 1972, kidnapping and ultimately killing the 11 Israeli athletes during a botched rescue attempt.

But the games went on, offering the families little official recognition for their loss, according to Rekhess-Spitzer.

Charity casinos hit jackpot

By GIL KEZWER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Charity casino gambling hit the jackpot when Ontario Finance Minister Ernie Eves' May budget permitted the establishment of up to 50 permanent charity locations across Ontario.

And the biggest winner of all may prove to be Michael Mandel, president of North York's W.I.N. Gaming Corp.

W.I.N. and its wholly-owned subsidiary, Fundtime Games Inc., is among the largest of the 42 operators licensed by the Ontario Gaming Control Commission of the province's Ministry of Consumer and Commercial Relations. Its stock, WNGM, listed on the Canadian Dealers Network, shot up 100 percent following Eves' announcement and is currently trading around $1.25.

Mandel anticipates that revenue from the 50 new permanent casinos will be $1.1 billion, much of it from video lottery terminals. He is optimistic that Fundtime will be allocated a licence for a "considerable number" of the new venues this fall. Mandel would like to operate them in Toronto's northern and eastern suburbs.

Michael Mandel

Operating at capacity, last year Mandel's company ran 145 three-day Monte Carlo events for 35 charities, each attracting 1,000 people. Revenues totalled $4.4 million. Clients, including the East and West Scarborough Boys and Girls Clubs, Youth Assisting Youth and the Reena Foundation for developmentally challenged adults, averaged a $10,000 net take from the W.I.N.-run events, compared to $3,000 to $4,000 raised by its competitors, Mandel says.

Though W.I.N. has 160 full-time and 50 part-time croupiers, managers, pit bosses and inspectors, the company's biggest asset may be Mandel himself. At 36, the Toronto-born entrepreneur has already founded three telecommunication and garment industry companies, each with multimillion-dollar sales annually.

He established Fundtime in 1993, after the cash-starved NDP government's passage of Bill 126 permitting a limited three-day charity casino once a month at the banquet hall of any licensed restaurant. The company went public in December.

"The perception of gambling has changed. Las Vegas has become a family-oriented destination. Gaming is in the mainstream now as a form of entertainment. It's a lot more socially acceptable than it was 10 or 15 years ago."

Mandel is dedicated to the legitimization and popularization of the business. He's past president of the Ontario Casino Operators Association and sits on the boards of the Association of Registered Casino Operators of Ontario, the Charitable Gaming Federation and the Ontario Charitable Gaming Advisory Board. He anticipates the further professionalization of charity casinos when the permanent venues begin to operate.

Hamilton cantor retires

By MOURA WOLPERT
CJN Correspondent

HAMILTON — After 20 years at Beth Jacob Synagogue, Cantor David Bercovici is retiring.

The congregation honored the cantor at a special Shabbat service and kiddush on June 22.

A dedicated teacher, Bercovici has taught countless bar/bat mitzvah boys and girls. He adores children, he has told The CJN, and though a strict teacher, he maintains that "kids have to enjoy learning" and that "learning should be fun."

As a result, Bercovici said, he has always enjoyed good relations with his students.

A Holocaust survivor from Transylvania who lost his entire family except for a brother and a sister, he has throughout his years here always led the Kaddish and chanted the K'El Maleh Rachamim at the annual community Yom Hashoah program and has served on the Yom Hashoah committee.

Bercovici grew up in a deeply religious home in Klausenburg (Cluj), where his father was a prominent community leader and president of Mizrachi. He studied at the Rabbi Peretz Yeshiva in Klausenburg and following his graduation, attended the Bucharest Conservatory of Music.

After liberation, he went to Austria, where a Joint Distribution Committee scholarship enabled him to study at the Bruckner Conservatory in Linz. While there, he conducted the High Holy Day services for Jewish personnel in the American armed forces.

In 1948, Bercovici, his wife, Henrietta, whom he had married in Bucharest in 1948, and their infant son, Rouvain, went to Israel, where they remained for 12 years.

But his brother and sister had settled in Canada and in 1960, Bercovici came here to join them.

In Toronto, he continued his studies at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Toronto and later served 16 years as cantor of the Hebrew Men of England congregation and principal of the religious school.

Bercovici is founder of the Toronto Council of Chazzanim and a member of the Cantors Assembly.

In 1978, he was awarded the diploma of a cantor-Chazzan (with full authority to serve as a minister of the Jewish faith) and in 1988, he was named an Honorary Fellow of the Cantors Institute of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America.

Saint John museum celebrates 10th year

By JOEL JACOBSON
CJN Maritime Correspondent

HALIFAX — Ten years ago, the Saint John Jewish Historical Museum opened its doors to a small, but appreciative Jewish audience.

Now celebrating a decade of educating New Brunswick's regional, national and international visitors' list, it is widely renowned for its permanent and seasonal displays, and is a winner of numerous awards.

"The number of visitors increases each year," says Marcia Koven, museum curator. "Our mandate is to educate and help eliminate discrimination."

Open Monday through Friday from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. and on Sundays through July and August from 1 p.m. to 4 p.m., the museum has permanent displays on religious artifacts, a chapel, ritual bath, Hebrew school classroom and an art gallery. The archives and a library available by appointment only have attracted historians and genealogists from around the world, says Koven.

Two years ago, the museum developed a series of eight educational outreach kits on Jewish holidays, customs and traditions and on the Holocaust, which have been widely requested, on a two-week free loan period, by school and church groups throughout the Atlantic region.

Koven says a video, the History of the Saint John Jewish Community, is available for $24.95 plus $5 for postage and handling. New displays this summer include Jewish weddings in Saint John from 1882 to 1986, old Jewish postcards and a display and sale of art by acclaimed print maker David Silverberg.

The Silverberg Judaic exhibit opens June 30 at 2 p.m. and will run through Labor Day, Sept. 4. Silverberg is artist-in-residence at Acadia University, Wolfville, N.S., and was formerly at Mount Allison University in Sackville, N.B.

The museum is closed July 25 and Sept. 23 for major Jewish holidays. The museum season ends Sept. 27, but is open for group tours by appointment throughout the year.

About families

Dear Susan,

Summer is always a difficult time for me. My children are away at camp and my workload lessens considerably. Rather than relaxing and enjoying the peace and quiet, I tend to get anxious and unhappy during these unstructured times. How can I overcome these feelings?

Dear Reader,

Your question speaks to a problem that is more common than one might think – the apparent inability to take pleasure and enjoyment from the "good times." In your particular case, you have provided two possible reasons why you are experiencing this.

The first possible explanation relates to the absence of your children and the feelings of sadness and anxiety that have become associated with this separation. Given that so much of your daily activity and energy – and hence, so much of your identity – may be tied to caring for your children, the absence of that activity may take away a very large part of who you think you are and how you define your worth. If that is so, it is no wonder that their absence can make you feel purposeless and anxious.

You also mention a decrease in workload, which seems to further exacerbate your distress. Again, the loss of such an important aspect of self-identification and self-worth could account for your inability to enjoy this respite.

Since you appear to like structure, the answer to your problem may be to structure both your working and leisure time. Learn to live with the unpredictable by making unpredictable times your friend and not your enemy. You might consider spreading your wings and learning to define who you are in terms that do not always include work and children, thus diminishing the intensity of your loss.

If these feelings persist, you might consider group or individual therapy as a venue for exploring the etiology of these losses and more aggressive strategies for overcoming them.

The inability to enjoy life, even when enjoyment would seem to be an obvious response, is one of the afflictions of our age. Your courage in confronting your own demons is a clear demonstration that you need not look outside of yourself to establish your value.

So enjoy your holidays – you deserve it!

Susan Leventhal is a family, marital and individual therapist, who has been practising for more than 17 years.

ספרותנו

Arabs react angrily

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu underscores a point during his address to the Joint Session of Congress last week. Vice-President Al Gore, seated behind the prime minister listens intently. JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's address last week to a joint session of the U.S. Congress has generated angry reaction from the Arab world.

"It seems to me that Mr. Netanyahu has made up his mind to go ahead with a declaration of war against the Palestinians," Faisal Husseini, the top Palestinian official in Jerusalem, told Army Radio last week.

In his speech, Netanyahu said Israel would move ahead with the peace process when Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat demonstrated that he could clamp down on terrorism.

Making no concessions to the Palestinians in a speech that reiterated the "peace with security" stance of his election campaign, he also declared that "there will never be a redivision of Jerusalem."

Hanan Ashrawi, recently named the Palestinian minister of higher education, called Netanyahu's remarks one of the "most dangerous speeches" ever delivered before Congress.

The Palestinian Council – the legislative body in the self-rule areas – met in a special session to discuss what Ahmed Karia, the council's speaker, described as the "unbearable Israeli violations" of the self-rule accords.

Karia said the council would present recommendations to the Palestinian leadership during a meeting in the Gaza Strip.

Arafat offered only a brief reaction, telling reporters in Gaza that Jerusalem is "the capital of Palestine, forever."

In Syria, Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa was quoted as saying the Israeli leader's policies were "irresponsible," warning that they would lead to a halt in the peace process.

Deportation decision to be appealed

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The federal government is appealing a court decision that brought denaturalization cases against three alleged Nazi war criminals to a halt and it will announce details of a case against a sixth Nazi war crime suspect – probably as early as this week.

The Federal Court of Appeal will be asked to overturn a stay order by Justice Bud Cullen in cases involving Johann Dueck, Helmut Overlander and Erichs Tobiass, said John Sims, a spokesperson for the federal Justice Department. At the same time, a sixth suspect will face deportation for his wartime activities.

Although he declined to give details, Sims said the sixth man is part of a group of 12 alleged Nazi war criminals that federal ministers pledged to bring to justice in January 1995.

Since that time, efforts to strip suspects of their citizenship and deport them have run into judicial roadblocks. Cullen granted a stay order after lawyers for Oberlander, Dueck and Tobiass argued that a March 1 meeting between Assistant Deputy Attorney General Ted Thompson and Federal Court Chief Justice Julius Isaac amounted to interference in the judiciary's independence.

The government said it will argue on appeal that judicial independence can be preserved without stopping the proceedings.

"We want to move forward quickly on these very important cases," said Justice Minister and Attorney General Allan Rock. "The government is committed to ensuring that justice is done and that our country does not become a safe haven for alleged war criminals."

The announcement was applauded by Canadian Jewish Congress. "In appealing the Federal

RABIN WARNS CABINET OF U.S. SELF-INTEREST

Yitzhak Rabin, Israel's ambassador to the United States, has upset some cabinet ministers – especially Foreign Minister Abba Eban, by claiming the U.S. was only concerned about its own interests in the Middle East.

The United States, Rabin claimed, did not want to arrive at a situation where Israel was its only remaining friend in the Middle East. Rabin's critics allege his outspokenness is part of his plan to make his personal mark on the public as he is expected to seek a post in the cabinet later this year.

UJA Women's Campaign changing

By FRANCES KRAFT
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The 1997 United Jewish Appeal (UJA) Women's Campaign has some changes in the works to make the project more efficient and volunteer friendly.

Following last year's innovative UJA campaign strategy of soliciting three-year pledges, volunteers can now concentrate on seeking new gifts, said 1997 Women's Campaign chair Vicki Campbell in a recent interview at the UJA office in the Lipa Green building.

One-third of UJA supporters here gave three-year pledges last year. Of the $34 million raised, just under $4 million was from Women's Campaign.

"Women's Campaign started out as being that little extra money. Now it's a very integral part of [the overall] campaign," said Campbell, an active community volunteer and former physical education teacher who has been giving time to UJA for almost 20 years.

"The reason I'm so hep on UJA is because a little over half the money stays here in the community, as well as going to Israel."

'Always looking for volunteers'

The daughter of Jewish immigrants who fled the Nazis in 1939, Campbell, 47, was born and raised in Allentown, Pa. She has lived here since 1976, following four years in Montreal, her husband's home town.

"Because my parents were fortunate enough to flee and be accepted, I want to [show] my gratitude."

Campbell also wants to set an example for her three children, ages 15, 18 and 21, and to "keep the community vibrant for them."

Some of the changes instituted for this year's Women's Campaign should help keep the volunteer community vigorous as well.

Because "everybody is busy," Women's Campaign now offers a choice of day or evening meetings, and the business typically conducted at two or three meetings was combined into one meeting for the first time. "It was very successful."

Campbell also wants to make the volunteer canvassers' work more personal and less intimidating for those who don't know other volunteers. Women's Campaign has introduced mentoring teams — "a great concept," enthused Campbell — to help new volunteers learn the ropes.

"We're always looking for [new] volunteers," she said. "Always."

The CJN at 25

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — At 25, The CJN is entering the prime of life.

It has successfully weathered the difficult formative years, enjoyed a growth spurt in its teen years and is now bracing to face the challenges posed by the new computerized information age.

Through the course of its first quarter century, it has moved around like the proverbial wandering Jew, upgrading its residences from a cramped one-room news office to its current premises on Gateway Boulevard.

On July 9, The Canadian Jewish News celebrated its 25th anniversary. Its modern history began when a group of community leaders purchased The CJN from private owner, M.J. Nurenberger, with the stated goal of turning it into a paper "that will be operated on a non-profit basis on behalf of the Jewish community."

In announcing the acquisition to CJN's readers at the time, Wolfe praised Nurenberger for his "independence, controversy (often provocative) and profound concern for the Jewish people. These qualities, the new management intends to perpetuate. It also intends to open the pages of the newspaper to diverse opinions within the Jewish community and to establish The CJN as a community forum."

The troika installed Sol Littman, who had served as executive director of the Canada Israel Committee, as editor and promised a change in direction and appearance for the paper.

Donald Carr, current president of The CJN, said that under Nurenberger, the paper "tended to reflect the views of the publisher and not the broad sweep of the community."

During Littman's two-year tenure, a variety of columnists debuted in the paper, including Rabbi Gunther Plaut, Rabbi Bernard Baskin, J.B. Salsberg and Miriam Herman with her still popular What's New and About People columns.

In those days, The CJN was a broadsheet which often published only six, eight or 12 pages.

By Sept. 10, 1971, the paper had trimmed its size (though it was still a broadsheet), adjusted its look and adopted the distinctive front-page banner lettering that is still used.

Littman, currently Canadian representative of the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, recalls it was a struggle finding advertising in those early days. With the closing of the Toronto Telegram, advertisers began to see The CJN as an alternative. They were also attracted by the suddenly increased CJN subscriber base that resulted from an arrangement between the paper and the United Jewish Welfare Fund, the precursor to the the Jewish Federation of Greater Toronto.

Under the arrangement, the federation purchased subscriptions for its donors and The CJN's subscriptions shot up from 500 to 6,000, Littman recalled.

Although the paper was criticized for its close ties to the federation and Littman feared every Jewish organization would expect coverage as of right, "we thought it was for the federation's own good not to turn it into a house organ."

The CJN supported the federation and Israel, particularly during UJA fundraising campaigns. "There was no question about that," Littman said. "The question was how much of the paper should be devoted to federation news and how it should be written."

In those early years, the paper benefited from the editing skills of Ralph Hyman, who had just retired from the Globe and Mail and had 35 years of journalistic experience.

Hyman took over the paper in 1973 and served as editor until 1980. His successor, Maurice Lucow, currently The CJN's Western correspondent from his home in Victoria, B.C., praised Hyman's professionalism and his ability to get out the paper using primitive typesetting technology and despite the lack of a timely newswire service.

Miriam Herman, who has written her distinctive columns since 1971, recalls Hyman as a warm and caring man.

Brian Stoneman, who's been with the paper for 23 years, also said of Hyman, "Everybody was really fond of Ralph.

"Ever since then it's been a great place to work. It's a company that cares about the people who work here," said Stoneman, the paper's composing room manager.

While that aspect of the work environment hasn't changed, other aspects of The CJN have changed considerably, particularly in the realm of technology.

Typewriters and carbon paper have given way to word processors and computers, and ad typesetters use sophisticated Macintosh computer programs to speed up a process that took ages with the old machinery.

While technology has changed, the unexpectedness and gravity of news stories covered by The CJN have not. One example was the tragic assassination of Yitzhak Rabin. Another was the historic handshake between Rabin and Yasser Arafat.

CJN general manager Gary Laforet said, "The '70s saw the horror of the Munich massacre and the shock of the Yom Kippur War, along with the elation following the raid on Entebbe.

"Those early years saw the emergence of the struggle for Soviet Jewry culminating in Operation Exodus.

"As a very junior staff member almost 25 years ago, I can remember the editorial and production staff ripping up pages following the first news reports from Munich. I saw the same grim expressions I had seen that long night once again just after the assassination of Rabin [last November].

"A sense of personal investment and caring throughout every department amid the good news

Kalejs linked to guard unit at concentration camp

By PAUL LUNGEN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Konrads Kalejs commanded a company of guards at the Salaspils concentration camp outside Riga, where prisoners were crammed together in sparse barracks, subjected to hard labor and periodically beaten, an immigration adjudicator was told last week.

"[Kalejs] gave the orders, who went on guard duty ... He gave the orders to the platoon leader and the top sergeant carried out the orders. The platoon leaders were under him," said Karlis Strazds, a former corporal in the Arajs Kommando (AK).

His videotaped testimony was recorded in Latvia in September 1987 as part of the U.S. Justice Department's case against Kalejs. Kalejs, an Australian citizen, was ordered deported from the United States and he left in 1994.

He came to Canada later that year. Canadian authorities are seeking a removal order against him on the basis that he is not a genuine visitor to Canada and because he allegedly participated in war crimes.

Prisoners died at the camp because of the conditions. "They were physically very weak and there were many illnesses," Strazds testified. "They lived very much crowded together. [There were] all types of illnesses and those who were older could not stand the labor. They were all very weak."

Strazds, who was stationed at Salaspils for about one week in 1942 before being transferred, said "the food was very poor, mostly soup. It was very thin [made from] potato and beetroot. Bread was mixed together with sawdust. I tried it once myself. I could not swallow it."

Strazds identified a special unit under another commander who patrolled the camp armed with truncheons and who administered beatings.

Evidence from a number of sources has identified Kalejs as a senior officer in the wartime Arajs Kommando, which collaborated with German forces in the murder of more than 30,000 Latvian Jews.

Strazds' testimony was the latest evidence that places Kalejs at the centre of the wartime Latvian collaboration with the Nazis. When his AK platoon was transferred to the Salaspils camp in November 1942 "there was already a guard company there. It was called the Kalejs company," Straszds said.

After serving in Salaspils, Strazds, a corporal, was put in charge of a guard unit at a camp called Sauriesi where 300 Latvian prisoners worked at a quarry. Kalejs, who appointed him to the new post, would come to the camp regularly to oversee the change of guard, Strazds said.

In June 1943, Strazds was transferred to the Harkov district where his AK unit guarded a small concentration camp. On one occasion, "they brought the gypsies for shooting."

The AK were given the task of bringing the intended victims to a pit and guarding the area while the shootings took place. Although his platoon was commanded by a Lt. Lacis, Strazds said that under the unit's chain of command, Lacis must have received orders from the company commander, Kalejs.

Strazds also identified Kalejs as part of a group of AK officers who later were stationed on the Latvian border with Byelorussia.

In other testimony, Strazds described his participation in a mass execution in April 1942. Speaking unemotionally and with barely any facial expression, Strazds said "they took 10 people and brought them to the opposite side of the pit. They stood with their backs to us and according to Lt. Galins' command, we shot at them. Then all the people shot were covered with sand. Then we returned back [to headquarters]."

In other testimony, Karlis Rozkalns testified on videotape that in early 1942 he was a police officer "and then for some days I was a guard at Salaspils and the commander of the company was Kalejs."

Afterwards, he was transferred to anti-partisan duty and he took part in a battle in a village near Nasva. After SS Gen. Stahlecker was mortally wounded, "in a short time it was seen that everything was burning there, smoke was rising. There were talks that all the inhabitants had been driven into one building and the building had been burned down. I didn't see it myself. The soldiers said so."

Rozkalns said Kalejs was a company commander, but he didn't know where he was during that battle. However, he testified that "Kalejs gave the order to go to that action. And Kalejs got his orders ... from Stahlecker probably."

The CJN celebrates

and the bad is a built-in advantage The CJN has," Laforet said.

The 1980s was a period of tremendous change for The CJN under Lucow's stewardship. Lucow, a veteran newsman who came to the paper after nine years as a publicist for the federation, hooked The CJN up to a computer wire service that brought in the Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA) and the Jerusalem Post Foreign Service.

Lucow, who worked at Maclean-Hunter publications for 15 years and had edited Style magazine, brought fashion supplements to the paper and then home decor and bridal pages. Advertising from the supplements "carried the paper," he said.

Patricia Rucker, who was editor of the paper from May 1989 to October 1994, said that under her stewardship, the biggest change was the increasing distinctiveness of the Montreal edition, which had been added in September 1977. The CJN hired a reporter to write in French, reflecting the growth in importance of the Sephardi community there.

Towards the end of Rucker's tenure, The CJN got a new look. The front page banner was given its distinctive blue color, and color photographs became a staple feature of page one. Due to rising newsprint costs, the paper also began to use a slightly smaller page size.

Carr, who was a reporter in England before moving to Canada, is pleased with the development of the paper but sees room for improvement. The paper is attempting to reach out to younger readers and "I'd like to see the paper become more national" in scope, he said.

For the current editor, Mordechai Ben-Dat, running The CJN "is an enormous privilege. I take the responsibility very seriously ... In the future, it's important that the paper reach higher and reach further. 'Further' in terms of attracting as many readers as possible, people who are interested in knowing what's going on in the life of the Jewish community in Canada. Reaching 'higher' by constantly striving for self-improvement, which means newer and different things in the paper."

NDP's anti-Semitism program still on: Tory minister

By RON CSILLAG
CJN Staff Reporter

Marilyn Mushinski

TORONTO — It may come as news to many Jewish Ontarians, but "most" aspects of an ambitious government campaign to fight anti-Semitism, launched by the NDP in 1992, have been implemented or are in the process of being implemented, says provincial Citizenship Minister Marilyn Mushinski.

The far-reaching plan, said to be unique in Canada, undertook a "proactive" battle against anti-Semitism and involved several ministries. It came on the heels of the desecration of three Metro synagogues.

The multi-point strategy called for a coordinated law enforcement response to hate propaganda and hate groups involving the attorney general and solicitor general; the development of public awareness, including seeking input from major Christian denominations; establishing direct, ongoing links with the Jewish community; expanding anti-hate education in schools and on police forces; and amending Ontario's Human Rights Code.

The plan said the Ministry of Citizenship would ask the attorney general to examine legal remedies like group defamation and pre-emptive actions that could prevent racist gatherings before they are held.

The initiative was unveiled, to kudos from the Jewish community, by the Ontario Anti-Racism Secretariat (OARS) in September, 1992. But little has been heard about it since. And last August, Ontario's cost-cutting Tories disbanded OARS.

"My understanding is that most of these initiatives have been implemented or are in the process of being implemented," Mushinski told The CJN in a recent interview. "Still under consideration" are aspects of the plan relating to hate crimes, and are before Attorney General Charles Harnick.

Harnick has already announced there is not enough evidence to launch criminal proceedings against pro-Nazi publisher Ernst Zundel.

Mushinski said the plan also called on the government to officially declare anti-Semitism a form of discrimination under Ontario's Human Rights Code. "My understanding is that that's been done. Anti-Semitism is discrimination. They're interchangeable."

But Mushinski acknowledges that "more effective effort" is needed from Ontario's Human Rights Commission to deal with systemic discrimination.

The minister said her government's Equal Opportunity Plan, which replaced the Employment Equity Act last November, undertook a three-pronged approach to reforming the human rights code and commission, including "administrative restructuring" — in this case, cutting 38 percent of senior ministry management — designed to shrink the commission's crushing backlog and improve delivery of other services.

Among other options, Mushinski says a review of the human rights code is needed. She is examining changing words like "shall" to "may," which she says will help with early resolutions and allow the commission to turn away "frivolous" cases.

Indeed, the Tories promised to make the human rights commission a prime weapon in the battle against discrimination. Mushinksi says her government plans "to make sure the [commission] will do what it is intended to do, which is deal with systemic discrimination."

The Tories have also eliminated the much-praised Cabinet Roundtable on Anti-Racism, in which Canadian Jewish Congress played a part. "Clearly however," Mushinski said, "that does not mean this government is any less committed to eliminating discrimination. This government is absolutely, 100 percent committed to the elimination of discrimination."

Cyclist raises funds for Aish Hatorah

By SIDURA LUDWIG
CJN Staff

TORONTO – Miles Bocknek is not your typical recreational cyclist.

While most satisfy their cycling crave with a quick ride around the block, Bocknek needs a slightly longer excursion.

"I like to do three- to four-hour rides. It's a good opportunity to push, test and enjoy myself," he said.

Bockneck is also interested in helping the Jewish community and recently decided to use his skills to raise money for Aish Hatorah. He planned to cycle from Richmond Hill to Georgian Bay, where an Aish Hatorah Shabbaton was being held. He was going to meet his family there.

Only, with $500 in pledges to live up to, he got up that Friday morning none too pleased at the sight outside his window.

"I woke up, saw the rain, and said, 'Wow! Great!' "

The estimated 10-hour ride looked as if it might be postponed for another time.

"Then, I said to myself, 'What am I being such a wimp for?' "

At noon, he walked into the kitchen in full cycling garb. His wife, Jackie Blaff said, "You're joking."

But by 12:30, a determined Bocknek was on the road.

In an interview with The CJN, Bocknek insisted that his love of riding is strictly recreational. He has never competed in a formal marathon and admitted that he is a slow rider. He developed his passion after a cycling trip he took through Europe when he was 22. Now at 34, the self-employed husband and father of three says he has difficulty finding the time to ride for enjoyment.

But that afternoon he had plenty of time to enjoy his ride. With the coming of Shabbat, Bocknek had to cut his trip down to six hours and ride only up to Orillia, where he was picked up by a friend.

He said the beginning of the trip from Bathurst and Elgin Mills to Newmarket was the hardest, because it was all uphill. The rest of his route was diverse, with flat landscape in the middle and a strong opposing wind at the end.

Bocknek hopes to ride more marathons for charity, possibly to open up the opportunity for a group of riders.

"But it would have to be outrageous," he said. "Maybe have three or four of us ride up to Thunder B..."

Future for Russian Jews not necessarily bad: Gur

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The outlook for Jews in Russia is not as grim as some commentators have painted it, Baruch Gur, the architect of Operation Exodus and now UJA shaliach in Toronto, said here recently.

"From a Jewish point of view, don't pay too much attention to the warnings," Gur told a small group at the Lipa Green building, as they watched a satellite broadcast of the reaction to the re-election of Boris Yeltsin.

"There is no difficulty today in getting an exit visa to leave Russia, the Jewish Agency is operating as before (though still without official status), emigration is continuing and it is possible to practise Judaism in Russia," he said.

A less optimistic view was given on the broadcast from Washington by Dimitri Sims, of the Nixon Centre for Peace and Freedom, a Russian immigrant who warned that General Alexander Lebed, a Yeltsin colleague, has "a nationalist streak potentially damaging to Jews.

"General Lebed is not personally anti-Semitic, but people around him are," Sims said.

On a recent visit to Moscow, he heard Russian bureaucrats mention for the first time that a certain person was Jewish and had relatives abroad, Sims said, "if they didn't like that person."

The position of Jews was not an issue in the Russian election, Gur noted, and predicted that Yeltsin would be careful not to make their position an international issue because of his desire for good relations with the West.

"Lebed is an important new player, but the Jewish issue for him is not an issue," he said. "He is a neo-fascist and idealizes law and order."

Though the election results showed a tendency to Russian nationalism, Gur said that this did not necessarily mean bad news for Jews. "Russians are against the 'others,' but they don't talk about Jews. Jews are not first or second on their list."

Responding on the broadcast to a question about why emigration of Jews from Russia is lagging, Martin Wenick, executive vice-president, Hebrew Immigrant Aid Society (HIAS), said a substantial proportion of those granted exit visas are aged or seriously ill, or have relatives who are seriously ill, and that it takes three or four years for them to make the move.

It is hoped that Jews will continue to leave Russia at the rate of about 100,000 a year, said Mark Levin, excutive director of the National Council for Soviet Jewry.

He claimed it was not contradictory for the council to encourage an exodus while at the same time supporting efforts to strengthen Jewish heritage in Russia.

JIAS announces national scholarships

TORONTO — At its Annual Meeting on June 9, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) Canada announced the winners of its national scholarships for 1996.

A bequest by the late John Hirsch, former artistic director of the Stratford Festival, has been used to set up a scholarship fund in the Performing Arts.

This year's winners are bachelor of music students: Daniel Bolshoy (Ottawa), classical guitar; Victoria Gomon (Winnipeg), piano; Eugenia Kirjner (Winnipeg), performance; and Tatiana Roitman (Winnipeg) piano.

A bequest by a former immigrant who had been helped by JIAS has helped establish an endowment fund for general scholarships.

Into waiting arms

Tentative first steps are more wisely taken in the direction of supportive, awaiting arms. Thus, it was not accidental that Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu made the first formal policy declarations of his month-old government in the bask and the glow of the American Congress.

Netanyahu was warmly received by the American legislators, who rose to their feet in demonstrative, effusive acknowledgment of the high regard with which one of the largest democracies on earth, and certainly the most powerful, holds for one of the smallest and certainly, one of the most courageous. It was a heartening show of support.

But, as history has proven, support between nations can be ephemeral.

For example, American political support for Israel often peaks in an election year and wanes in mid term. Atmospheric disturbances can all too quickly turn a warm glow into a cool shadow. Although there can be no denying the Clinton administration and the current Congress have been among the most supportive ever of Israel and its people, we will have to wait until after the American elections in November to see whether that support will continue unabated.

We will also have to wait to see how the new government's policies are received both in Washington and in the Middle East.

Netanyahu introduced new concepts into the region's peace vocabulary. And it was evident, despite the friendly, amiable reception personally accorded the prime minister by President Bill Clinton and Congress, policy makers and pundits alike were speculating about the concrete meaning of these concepts and about their impact on both the future of bilateral relations between Israel and the United States and on multilateral relations between Israel and its peace partners.

The prime minister spoke of establishing a "code of conduct" binding upon all parties to the Middle East peace process. The code should stand upon three pillars: security for all peoples in the region, reciprocity in honoring commitments and agreements and the application of standards of democracy and human rights. By including the third pillar, the prime minister was acknowledging that he and his government are prepared to wait a long time before seeing the flower of a true and lasting peace in the region. The Middle East has not been a hospitable climate for democracy or for its fruit, human rights.

The prime minister made it clear to the president, to Congress, and to the world that his government will follow a different path to peace than the one travelled by the Labor government.

Israeli media reported that the prime minister told Clinton during their private talks that Israel will not conduct peace talks with Syria as long as it continues to sanction Hezbollah and other terror actions against Israel. Ha'aretz reported that the prime minister rejected the president's demand to refrain from establishing new settlements.

The reports were borne out at their joint press conference. Netanyahu refused to give merely soothing answers. "We have our own interpretation of land-for-peace, our own interpretation of [UN Security Council Resolutions] 242 and 338 that call for Israel to make concessions of land in order to achieve secure and recognized boundaries."

In the unfolding weeks and months, these policy pronouncements, the tentative first steps of Israel's new government, will become actions "on the ground."

At that time we will be better able to judge whether American arms will still be waiting in support.

Stratford should retire Merchant of Venice

Much as I appreciate the Stratford Festival's sincere attempt to "sanitize" The Merchant of Venice by giving Shylock dignity and breadth, I nevertheless disagree heartily with Arnold Ages' evaluation of the play's performance. Despite the brilliance of Douglas Rain's performance, it remains what it always has been and was always intended to be, a cruelly anti-Semitic period piece.

I have seen the 1996 version of Merchant and can attest that it is a distinct improvement on the two previous efforts mounted by Stratford. However, despite intelligent direction, marvelous costumes and magnificent acting, it remains a brilliantly written "comedy" that finds its humor in vicious, sly, deeply prejudiced attacks on Jews.

There is no way the essential character of the play can be altered. Although Shylock appears in only five scenes, the "Jew" is the central character, the engine that drives the drama. Without Shylock and his relentless demand for his pound of flesh, there isn't much of a play. Being a genius, Shakespeare made Shylock into a more complex character than the hand-wringing buffoons and cardboard Jewish villains invented by his predecessor, Christopher Marlowe. But in the end, he portrays Shylock as an iredeemable Christian-hater who despises gentiles for lending money without interest, thereby driving down his own usurious prices.

The major fault in the play is that Shylock, unlike all other Shakespeare characters, is not merely the victim of the contradictions in his own character, but representative of a race that is vile, unyielding, unforgiving and inhumanly cruel. Hamlet may have been moody and unpredictable, but he was not assumed to be representative of all Danes. Lady Macbeth was ruthless and ambitious, but the role did not spill over onto all women and all Scots.

I would urge the Stratford Festival to set aside the play at the season's end and concentrate on less hurtful plays written by the bard.

Reviewer can't have it both ways

Odd that Arnold Ages can enthuse about his enjoyment of The Merchant of Venice at Stratford and at the same time vilify "Shakespeare's malevolent script." Reminds me of people who revel in nature while decrying its alleged cruelty. Tough to be a creator ...

The complicity of ordinary Germans

Why, I wonder, is Sheldon Kirshner so anxious to absolve the wartime Germans from the charge of harboring anti-Semitic sentiments? He himself writes in your June 20 edition: "It is indisputable that ordinary Germans were complicit in the Holocaust." He goes on to say, "It is plainly evident that the Nazi regime's demonization of Jews could not have succeeded without a deeply ingrained anti-Semitic tradition."

Then he proceeds to deny all this by saying, "[Goldhagen] offers no compelling evidence that German civilians en masse concurred with Hitler's eliminationist anti-Semitism."

To which I say: The entire book (I have read it too) is itself the most compelling evidence of such approval.

As for the Germans' re-invention of themselves as liberals and democrats, the jury is still out on that.

Seeks survivors from Stazow

Mr. Cwaigenbock, born in Stazow (Poland) in July 1924, was sent to various concentration camps such as Buchenwald, Dachau at the age of 15.

He survived this tragic experience and is now residing in France since 1947. He would like to meet survivors, or learn if there is an association or a community from Stazow (Poland) with an address.

Seeks Finesilver descendants

I am seeking descendants of possible siblings of my grandfather, Hyman Finesilver, who lived in Toronto during World War I. In 1913, he set out for Canada leaving his family behind in London. He returned to England in 1919. He was probably attracted to Toronto by friends or relatives and I have found out that during his stay in Toronto he first lodged with Morris Goldberg at 125 Duke St., and subsequently with Barnet Weinstein at 44½ Gerrard St. W.

The Yassi massacre...55 years later

By BARUCH COHEN

In Romania, the killing of Jews began in June 1940 with the retreat of the Romanian army from territories ceded to the Soviet Union. Orders for the extermination policy — conditions for which had been latent in Romania since the 1930s — were received enthusiastically by the military and civil administration, as well as by the infamous Iron Guard.

On June 11 and 12, 1941, the Romanian and German governments signed several accords in Munich, and later in Berchtesgaden. According to these agreements, Romania pledged allegiance to the German struggle against the Soviet Union and offered full military assistance in an attempt to regain control over territories surrendered in 1940.

At dawn on June 21, 1941, the voice of General Ion Antonescu — Romania's Fuhrer — was heard on the radio, addressing the army: "I order you to cross the Prut." Romania was easily moved by the wave of events that preceded World War II, and became an unconditional supporter and ally of Hitler's Germany, fostering its own anti-Semitic movements.

On the eve of Saturday, June 28, 1941, the chilling cry of air raid sirens could be heard throughout Yassi. It was a false alarm that had been ordered beforehand by those who were organizing the "action." Later, the sky was set ablaze by a rocket, a signal to begin the pogrom. The following day, The Sunday That Was, became known as the bloodiest day in the history of Romanian Jewry. The Jews of Yassi were forcibly gathered and brought to police headquarters on false pretexts and were then fired upon randomly.

The army, the gendarmes and the Iron Guard fired, wholly without mercy, on an amorphous mass of people who died on their knees like cattle. They died as a result of beatings; they died after being shot; they died by being smothered by the corpses that covered them. Their shrieks, groans and wails had little effect on the souls of those who carried out the crime, those who ordered it or those who watched impassively as if at some spectacle. Meanwhile, the pogrom was going on in the city, insane in its dimension and with a cruelty that made everything that had ever happened before pale by comparison.

"By the number of its victims, by the bestiality of the means used to torture and kill, by the vast scope of the pillaging and destruction, by the participation of the agents of the public authorities to whom the life and property of the citizens were entrusted, the pogrom at Yassi marked at the local level the crowning of an accursed, injurious effort which has violated the Romanian conscience for a period of three-quarters of a century, and it opens at the worldwide level the most tragic chapter in history," writes Matatias Carp in Cartea Neagra — The Black Book.

"It became the signal, not only to the Romania of the Legion or of Antonescu, but also to all fascist Europe, for massacres which during the following years were to kill six million Jewish people."

In his book Kaput, Italian journalist Curzio Malaparte describes the scene with a sharpened pen dipped in gall and disgust. Later, he went to Warsaw and was present at a discussion between Hans Frank, the governor general of Poland; Ludwig Fischer, the governor of Warsaw; and Otto Wachter, the governor of Krakow. Wachter was also one of the assassins of Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss of Austria.

Seated comfortably, sipping the drinks they had been served, Frank asked the journalist:

"How many Jews were killed that night? In the official Communiqué, Mihai Antonescu, the deputy prime minister, mentions 500 dead."

"I, Curzio Malaparte, replied: 'But the unofficial figure sent up by Colonel Lupu is 7,000 Jews.' "

"That is a respectable figure," Frank answered. "But we must be sincere, that wasn't nice."

"No, it wasn't nice," said Fischer, the governor of Warsaw, shaking his head in disapproval.

"It is an uncivilized method," said Wachter, the governor of Krakow, with a tone of disgust.

"The Romanian people are not civilized people," said Frank, contemptuously.

"That's right, they have no culture," said Fischer.

"When is necessary, only when is necessary," Frank repeated, emphasizing each syllable, "we use the art of surgery, not that of butchery. Has anyone ever seen a massacre of Jews in the streets of a German town?"

"It's a question of methods and organization," said Fischer.

Within 24 hours, a proud, creative, and culturally rich Jewish community was destroyed. Of the 35,000 Jews that lived in Yassi, an estimated 8,000 to 10,000 were murdered or maimed. An additional 2,421 Jews were crammed into two death trains; many were deported to various destinations and hundreds of others were to die. The inferno of the death train continues even today to singe the souls of those few who managed to survive.

In the summer of 1941, black was the predominant color in Yassi. Yellow was the color of the stars sewn onto the clothing of all Jews.

On July 3, 1941, in an article by Marius Mircu titled Progromul de la Iasi — The Yassi Pogrom, the Bucharest newspaper announced the official government communiqué:

"In Yassi, 500 Judeo-Communists were executed. They fired on German and Romanian soldiers from houses."

The newspaper warned that "any attempt to repeat these acts of cowardly aggression will be repressed unsparingly. For every German or Romanian soldier, 50 Judeo-Communists will be executed."

Malaparte, the Italian journalist, was in Yassi as a correspondent for the Carriere de la Sera. In Kaput, he reported that "there were groups of Jews in the streets followed by soldiers and inhabitants of the city armed with sticks and iron bars, and groups of gendarmes were firing weapons into the doors and windows of Jewish houses."

As Malaparte looked onto Lapusneanu street from the window of the consulate, "the street was covered with human bodies ... Packs of dogs ran up to the cadavers and were feeding on the meat, and groups of Jews guarded by gendarmes and soldiers armed with guns were watching over them, seeking to separate the corpses, and to put them at the edge of the street."

Fifty-five years ago, on July 8, 1941, Ion Antonescu, Romania's leader, clearly stated his government's policy regarding Jews at a session of the cabinet. He said, according to The Silent Holocaust by I.C. Butnaru: "It makes no difference to me that we'll go down in history as barbarians. The Roman Empire performed a series of acts of barbarism according to our present standards, and nevertheless it was the most magnificent political establishment. There has not existed a more favorable moment in our history. If it is needed, shoot all of them with machine guns."

Such are the terrible recollections of the infamous Sunday That Was. The Yassi pogrom began in Bucharest on January 21, 1941, and was preceded by the Dorohoi pogrom of June 1940.

Today, in the newly "free" regime that followed the dictatorship of Communist Nicolae Ceausescu, anti-Semitism still threatens the country's 12,000 to 14,000 Jews.

Popular daily and weekly anti-Semitic publications are sold by the hundred thousands. These publications warn Romanians of the growing number of Jews and of their plot to take control of the country. Popular headlines routinely speak of Too many Jews Who Have Climbed to High Positions and warn that It Rains Jews by the Buckets.

Romania has the largest number of anti-Semitic groups and publications of all Eastern European countries. Openly anti-Semitic intellectuals and politicians gain much respectability. Although the ruling elite is aware of the dangers surrounding such a situation, its growing political dependence on such extremists rules out any significant action against that extremism.

On June 19, 1991, the Romanian parliament rose for a minute of silent tribute to the "Great Patriot," Marshal Ion Antonescu, who joined in Hitler's war and who ordered pogroms and deportations, which claimed the lives of over 300,000 of Romania's Jews.

On Oct. 22, 1993, a statue of Antonescu was erected in the town of Slobozia, near Bucharest. This statue is the first of a war criminal from Eastern Europe erected since the end of World War II. The dedication was attended by government officials, and members of parliament like Corneliu Vadim Tudor, a vicious anti-Semite.

Since that day, more statues have been erected in the memory of Antonescu in cities across the country.

Politics and strange bedfellows

By Shira Herzog

The recent economic debate in the Israeli press is reminiscent of the debate in Canada over budget cuts imposed by various provincial governments.

It was clear, even before the election, that any incoming government would impose budgetary cuts to deal with a growing trade deficit and an inflation rate that exceeded earlier targets. But the reaction to the economic measures proposed by the newly elected Likud government also contains a commentary on a fascinating paradox within the government.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's economic approach (which is shared by Bank of Israel Governor Ya'acov Frankel) derives from the American-style neo-conservative school of thought. He is in favor of a market economy, little — if any — government intervention in socio-economic affairs and privatization of all government holdings. Statements made by Netanyahu and his advisors during the election campaign and immediately following their victory could have emanated from the Republican Congress in Washington or the Harris government in Ontario.

The current irony is that Netanyahu's voters are those most likely to be hurt by the government's declared economic policies. Those that voted him into power include traditional, observant, Sephardi voters for Shas; ultra-Orthodox Ashkenazi voters for the United Torah Party; secular Russian immigrants, the settler community that voted for the National Religious Party; and Likud's own traditional voter base. With the exception of the settler community, most of these are beneficiaries of the state's social and welfare services.

The social lobby on behalf of the have-nots is in the government itself. And if the state devolves some of its own responsibility for social services to non-governmental, non-profit bodies that work on behalf of some of these political parties or interest groups, government ministry budgets may indeed shrink, but the result may be greater fragmentation and competition for reduced resources among sectoral interest groups.

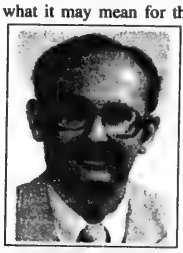
The historic irony of Israeli politics is that Netanyahu's coalition — a veritable Israeli mosaic — should theoretically be part of a social-democratic government. But over the last 20 years, the Labor party has been unable to attract to its ranks socio-economic groups who still feel outside the establishment. Critics from within Labor argue that their own party could not appoint a cabinet with a Moroccan-born foreign minister, a Kurdish-born defence minister and a Yemenite minister for internal security (David Levy, Yitzhak Mordechai and Avigdor Kahalani, respectively).

In the last election, those who had blithely assumed that ethnicity no longer mattered in Israel were proven wrong. The energy, passion and intense engagement in the political process existed in what is loosely called the "periphery." A small example: In affluent "northern Tel Aviv," support for Labor was strong, but voter participation was lower than in 1992. In poorer "southern Tel Aviv," a Likud stronghold, voter participation was greater than in 1992. Israelis in the "periphery" did not buy Labor's equation: "the peace process = economic growth = modernization." To them, Labor's vision lacked the socio-cultural values that would make it relevant to their world view.

But with Netanyahu at the helm of Likud, the internal contradiction between the economic leadership in the cabinet (Frankel and finance minister Dan Meridor) and the entire coalition representing the "periphery" is all too apparent. Will it hold? Will an Israeli-style Democratic alternative emerge from within the Labor camp? Or will internal pressures force a pragmatic dilution of the government's declared intentions? Only time will tell.

Several of the $1.4 billion (US) in budget cuts announced last week will have a direct impact on lower-income Israelis, government statements to the contrary notwithstanding. An increase in public transportation costs, a reduction in child credits, cancellation of discounts on public services for pensioners, direct per-diem payments for hospitalization — all erase some of the remaining vestiges of the Israeli welfare state. They also create a new disenchantment with the government by some of its traditional voters. In Israel, as in Canada, a realignment in political loyalties and ideologies may well be the interesting internal story of the next decade or two.

Israel must avoid polarization



By Morton Weinfeld

As the dust settles following the Israeli elections, the question which arises is not so much what happened, but what it may mean for the future.

The political culture will change. The office of the prime minister will become ever more presidential, in the American sense. This means more policy-making centred there rather than in the Knesset. It also means more American-style media hype on the private lives of Israeli leaders. Already Ma'ariv has devoted more space to the flap over the firing of the Netanyahus' young nanny than to preparations for Benjamin Netanyahu's trip to Washington. And as I write this, the mystery concerning Netanyahu's American identities continues to unfold.

Most important, when one looks at the Knesset race, the decline of support for the two main parties and the rise in support for the religious bloc deserve comment.

It is true that not all those supporters wish to see a tighter control by halachic authorities over Israeli life. Many of the Shas supporters voted out of a sense of ethnic (Sephardi) solidarity, or in support of the idea of reverence for tradition.

But there is no denying that 20 percent of the seats in the Knesset are now held by the religious parties, and this percentage is likely to increase. Religious families are larger than the non-religious. Israelis who emigrate from Israel are less likely to be religious. So the population proportion that is Orthodox is likely to increase. Without the recent influx of Soviet Jews, the electoral successes of the religious parties would have been even greater.

How do we react to this? Already one can hear jokes among those disappointed with the results. For example: Anyone flying to Israel will now have to get to the airport four hours before flight time, to allow for a check of t'fillin and tzitzit. It remains to be seen how the religious parties will wield the power they now enjoy as the second largest bloc of support in the Likud led government.

An Orthodox Israeli professor of Judaic studies once told me that the worst thing for the quality of religious life in Israel was the political role of the religious parties. In fact, he felt that only a separation of "church and state" would enable the majority of secular Israelis to begin the difficult process of rediscovering the joys of religious Judaism. Who knows?

Most North American Jews would be appalled if formally Christian parties suddenly began to attract 20 percent of the voters in national elections. Pat Robertson and his ilk, whether in the United States or in Canada, would never enjoy the support of Jewish voters. Just recently, the Southern Baptists in the United States have reaffirmed their commitment to try to convert the Jews. If a right-wing Christian party were to gain steadily in popularity, pledged to re-establish Christianity in the public sphere in Canada, Jews would be the first to sound the alarm. And rightly so.

Canada, unlike the United States, does not have a constitutional separation of church from state. This permits government funding to be used to support private religious schools. Yet this blurring of the line today leads to little coercive imposition of religion and religious practice on Canadians.

Jews who identify as Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist or secular — and who comprise 80 percent of the Jewish population in North America — may resent any further attacks on their tenuous status in Israeli life. Those who are staunch supporters of liberal democracy fear that an increasing influence of Israel's religious parties risks further erosion of the liberal-democratic basis of citizenship and civil rights.

Despite the efforts of the Christian right — which does not yet enjoy direct political power — North American societies have moved in the direction of religious pluralism. It is unclear how Israel will evolve.

And yet, there is something so serene, magical, about the fact that in Jerusalem and other largely religious areas in Israel, daily routine grinds to a halt as Shabbat approaches. True, many Israelis may choose to spend Shabbat at the beach or at a soccer match — but by and large they know it is Shabbat. As fond as I am of John Locke and John Stuart Mill, I would be sad indeed if Shabbat in Israel were to eventually go the way of Sunday in North America.

The trick will be to avoid further polarization, while trying to respect both the value of Judaic tradition and the individual rights and freedoms of Israeli citizens.

New 'Merchant'

By Rabbi Gunther Plaut

Read a newspaper, listen to the radio or watch television, and your attention is instantly piqued when you see or hear the word "Jewish" or "Israel." If there are statistics on such things, they would undoubtedly show that these two words and the subjects they denote occur more frequently than any other religious/ethnic description, despite our small number in a world of billions of people.

This well-known phenomenon pops up in unusual places, one of them being on the theatre stage. There are a lot of playwrights and hundreds of good plays that can be performed, but somehow I suspect that few, if any, make their appearance more frequently than Shakespeare's The Merchant of Venice. Why? Because Antonio and Portia are such memorable figures? Or because of the easy-to-remember Shylock, the Jew who gets his come-uppance?

There will be many among my readers who have unpleasant memories of their high school education, when this drama was discussed in class. They may not have been as abused as the children in a Waterloo class were some years ago, but their discomfort was real enough. And that is true for the Jewish community as a whole whenever and wherever the play is performed — and this year it is featured in no less a place than Stratford.

I have not as yet seen the play, but by all accounts the production is innovative and thoughtful, and makes of Shylock not the stereotypical Jewish villain, but a Jewish hero of sorts. The credit apparently goes to Marti Maraden, the play's director, who sets the action in pre-World War II Venice. This near-contemporaneity forces the audience to consider their own attitudes and prejudices. There is general agreement that Maraden has brought off a memorable re-creation of the play and thereby, perhaps, has caught the true intent of Shakespeare (something we will never know).

An addition to the original script is even introduced, although no new words are put in Shakespeare's mouth. The stage shows a cafe that the Jew Tubal enters; two Mussolini blackshirts glare at him, clearly wishing him away. Waiters notice the visual confrontation and lean all chairs against the table that Tubal meant to occupy, so that now he cannot sit down. He turns around and leaves. This, of course, is not Shakespeare, but it does set the mood for contemplating the underlying stream of consciousness that the audience is invited to make its own.

A recent issue of the Jerusalem Post also reviewed The Merchant of Venice — but not the Stratford production. This one, of all places, was a German production in Weimar, the city of Goethe and the birthplace of the short-lived modern Republic. An Israeli, Hanan Snir, was invited to direct it and he set the play in Buchenwald, the infamous concentration camp not far from the city. Actors and audience have hesitated to accept the new venue, and Snir was not surprised. It seems that the Merchant of Venice with its many faces will see still more revivals in the years to come.

Benjamin Eisenstadt and his son, Marvin, were the developers of Sweet 'N Low, the low calerie sweetner. Born in New York City's Lower East Side, Eisenstadt was originally a lawyer. In 1957, the Eisenstadts blended saccharin with dextrose and other ingredients to form Sweet 'N Low, a phenomenally successful product. Eisenstadt is also credited with having invented sugar packets, widely used in restaurants and catered affairs.

Joseph Churba, a national security expert, was at the centre of a political storm in 1976 when, as the U.S. Air Force's top Middle East analyst, he criticized the chair of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. George Brown. In an interview, Brown called Israel "a burden" to U.S. interests. Churba hit back, describing Brown's statement "dangerously irresponsible." As a result of the flap, Churba was forced out of his post. During the 1980 presidential election, he was an advisor to Ronald Reagan.

The key to faith

By RABBI AARON FLANZRAICH

When I was studying in Israel, I had a very dear teacher who would always remind me that nothing in the world is superfluous and insignificant, that everything has a purpose and a place and if we look hard enough, a deep message as well. Therefore, the very items that we may in fact dismiss as nonsensical, might have a lesson.

With this in mind, I'd like to share with you an exercise that I learned many years ago, although not in the hallowed halls of a yeshivah or in the studious chamber of a university library. This lesson was given to me on a slab of cold ice at 5:30 in the morning.

As a young man, I was obsessed with ice hockey and skating, so much so that my parents dutifully arranged for me to take "power skating" lessons with a professional instructor. In addition to learning the mechanics of skating, I believe that something far dearer (in retrospect) was imparted to me.

As you work through the various skating drills, the instructor forces you to go a little faster, to extend a little farther than the last time. With each practice cycle, you end up slightly more skilled than before. The problem is, when you do things that you've never done before, falling becomes a very real possibility.

While people may judge how well they learned to skate by how often they didn't fall, the power skater counts every fall and appreciates each one; for with each tumble, you've pushed yourself a little farther than before. And you can only be better because of it.

People often come to me complaining, wishing they could have more religion in their lives. They are searching for the key to faith. In and out of a synagogue they come, observe a Yizkor or come for the High Holy Days. In the end, they always seem to yearn for more. But something seems to be standing in the way.

"Rabbi," they tell me, "I wish I could observe like you do. I wish I could have your faith."

In an era where so many people are looking for answers, we need to solve this riddle. How can we get more from our lives?

In this week's parashah of Devarim, we open the final book of our Bible. As we begin, the text reads: "And these are the words that Moses spoke to Israel ... " It all seems simple enough, yet the famous commentator Yalkut Shimoni reminds us of a problem. Wasn't it Moses, the Yalkut Shimoni asks, who said when G-d instructed him to speak to Pharaoh, "I am not a man of words"? How could Moses have changed so deeply, so significantly in his lifetime?

The answer given is provocative. We are taught that Moses did indeed change. Over time as he became accustomed to speaking and communicating, Moses became this "man of words." With the help of G-d, Moses was able to live up to the lofty responsibility of faithfully transmitting G-d's word to man.

We wonder how we can ever begin to work our faith into our lives. There is so much to it how do we start? The answer is "just start." Give charity, buy kosher food, light Shabbat candles. If you do this already, consider praying at least once a day, study before you go to sleep, attend your synagogue, visit someone who is ill or sad.

Each day we live, we must force oursleves to discover the essence of our spirit — to become the kind of people we want to be.

Sadly, we have put on labels that prevent this from happening. We call ourselves Conservative, Reform or Orthodox Jews. This is a tragedy. G-d never calls us anything but Jews. Nothing about us is predetermined, none of what we are is forced on us. As Moses did, and as a little boy did with his skating instructor, let's use these precious weeks before Rosh Hashanah to push ourselves a little farther, let's extend to use and try our faith.

Step by step we will begin to grow as we push ourselves to the point where we feel like we're going to fall. For each time, everything becomes a little easier, and a bit more natural.

Indeed, the shells we live in are comfortable, and the way that we are used to living and observing is safe and secure. Yet, if we never reach out, we'll never find anything more about who we are than we do now. We will never discover the greatness, the potential and the strength that lie within, the great soul and the endless streams of faith.

Holocaust oral history vital

By BILL SURKIS

Guest Voices

The recording of eye-witness testimony of the events of the Shoah is crucial. The recording of personal historical information on video becomes increasingly more important as each day passes and fewer eye-witnesses are able to complete the record.

Oral history of the Holocaust is vital to combat the rise of prejudice, anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial and their dissemination through the media and the Internet.

The Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) has worked with scholars and academics over the past five years to develop the Witness-to-History oral history project, which records the testimonies of survivors of labor, concentration and death camps, those who lived in hiding, partisans, rescuers and liberators, the eye-witnesses to the Holocaust now living in Montreal.

The MHMC is recording six interviews per week. To date, over 300 tapes have been completed in the project.

Each interview is conducted in two parts; the first is a short pre-interview one week prior to the television interview. This allows the interviewer to do follow-up research on places and activities so that the questioning in the interview is precise and appropriate.

The project is unique in that the videos are completed on a two-camera system, one recording the standard head and shoulders view, the second recording the full body image allowing non-verbal communication to be recorded.

After the interview, photographs, documents and items of personal memorabilia are recorded so that the final version of the film will show the items to which the survivor is referring.

All interviews are recorded by professional videographers and the witness receives a copy of the tape within two weeks of completing the interview.

The master copies of the tapes are catalogued and placed in the MHMC archives. Copies are provided to the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington and to Yad Vashem in Israel.

There are an estimated 8,000 or more eye-witnesses to the Holocaust living in Montreal, according to the 1991 census. No single organization can manage to video all the individuals in the next few years. The MHMC is pleased that the Living Testimony program of McGill University coordinated by Prof. Yehudi Lindeman continues to record these vital histories, and for a short time, the Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation will also do some interviews in the Montreal area.

For more information, any eye-witness to the Holocaust interested in giving testimony should call the MHMC at 514-345-2605.

Nightline by Ted Koppel & Kyle Gibson, Random House $35

It all started in November 1979, when the American Embassy in Tehran was overrun by terrorists. Sixty-five Americans — diplomats, intelligence officers and marines — were taken hostage. As days and months went by, the eyes of Americans were focused on the ABC television program, America Held Hostage, to capture the latest events in an exciting drama. The monopoly of Johnny Carson's The Tonight Show was broken.

Nightline's genesis

The hostage crisis over, the opportunity was ripe for a new program to deal with serious news topics. Ted Koppel, who had proved himself an adept and quick-thinking interviewer, was chosen to anchor Nightline. This he has done with verve and brio over the past 16 years.

This book is an informative, amusing, anecdotal account of the exciting behind-the-scenes chaos that is inevitable in the show that chooses in the morning its topic for the evening, only to change it later in the day as a more important story breaks.

One of the most daring of the shows took place in Jerusalem in 1988 when, for the first time, Israeli and Palestinian leaders met face to face for intense debate. At Palestinian insistence a waist-high symbolic wall was erected running down the length of the stage to separate the two sides. The show, although filled with heated and acrimonious exchanges, helped to break down traditional barriers and played a role in the eventual peace process.

Frequently people used the show as a "last resort." Gary Hart appeared in a vain attempt to jump-start his moribund presidential campaign. Ferdinand Marcos hoped that a Nightline appearance might rekindle support from the Reagan administration. Michael Dukakis sought money and support for his fading presidential campaign late in October 1988 when he sat down for a 90-minute interview.

Four thousand programs later, Koppel and the show's producer, Kyle Gibson, have summed up 16 years of an ongoing experiment that brought people together who were often worlds apart, for the enjoyment and enlightenment of a vast international audience.

Plenty of Olympic coverage available on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

In a few days, the entire world will be watching Atlanta as a record number of countries compete in the 26th Olympiad.

Even if you didn't decide to mortgage your home for some tickets to the Games, you can travel to the Olympics via the Internet at a fraction of the cost.

Although large numbers of Jewish athletes are not immediately identified with the Olympics, Israeli athletes and Jewish competitors from other countries have made their mark. The most complete source for information can be found on the official Israeli Olympic site [http://olympic.ibm.net.il/]. This colorful and well-designed area is divided into sections which profile each member of the delegation, promise the latest news from the Games and even include political cartoons about Israel's past performances at the Olympics. This wonderful site is in Hebrew only, so to enjoy it you'll need to have Hebrew fonts installed and a good knowledge of the language.

For daily progress in English about Israel's Olympic team, you can consult the Jerusalem Post Sports Internet Edition [http://www.jpost.co.il/sport/sport_si.html]. There are also many general sites on the Internet which will deliver up-to-date results from Atlanta [http://www.atlanta.olympic.org].

Although the Olympics are a forum to celebrate Israel's most talented athletes, nothing can be the same after the 1972 Munich Olympics when eleven Israeli athletes were murdered by Palestinian terrorists. That tragedy and its aftermath are summarized at [http://www.bull.it/coni/olimpi/emona.html] and [http://www.adventure.com:80/library/encyclopedia/sports/munich.html].

But by far the most comprehensive essay is found in Hebrew at the Israel Olympic site [http://olympic.ibm.net.il/remember.htm].

In addition to a more detailed description of the situation, there are biographies and photographs of the slain athletes.

Despite the media frenzy that always surrounds the Olympics, it seems that not everyone is caught up in the hype.

In his essay on "Why the Olympic Spirit Lacks a Jewish Neshama," Calgary's Eliezer Siegel [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/870901_Olympic.html] suggests that historically, Judaism has looked upon organized athletics at worst as a vicious and cruel pastime and at best as a frivolous pursuit. One notable exception, however, was Israel's first Chief Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook who believed in the importance of maintaining a healthy mind in a healthy body.

It may be due to this religious legacy or to the fact that Israel has always had other priorities that its athletes have not brought home much gold or silver or bronze.

Israel has only won two medals in its Olympic history.

Half-middleweight Yael Arad won silver and lightweight Oren Smadga won bronze for judo in Barcelona in 1992 [http://olympic.ibm.net.il/judo.htm]. As for Jewish athletes from outside Israel, no overview of the Olympics would be complete without acknowledging the efforts of two of its most famous competitors. The United States' Mark Spitz [http://sports.eb.com/olympic/micro/561/52.html] was the first athlete to win seven gold medals in a single Olympic Games. And Britain's Harold Abrahams [http://sports.eb.com/olympic/micro/722/60.html] and [http://www.adventure.com:80/library/encyclopedia/sports/chariotf.html] won gold in the 100-meter final at the 1924 Paris Olympics. Abrahams' story is well-known thanks to the 1981 film Chariots of Fire. (By the way, brief excerpts from the famous soundtrack of that movie are available at [http://bau2.uibk.ac.at/perki/records/chariots/chariots.html].)

Finally, if you are one of the fortunate about to make the trek to Atlanta, Beth Jacob Synagogue is preparing kosher meals and bag lunches daily [http://www.toll-free.com/bethjacob/olympics.html]. If you prefer restaurant dining, here's a list of kosher establishments from the Atlanta Kashruth Commission [http://www.kashrut.com/atlanta.htm].

However if you're like most, you'll probably get no closer to Atlanta than the nearest TV set. No matter. You can STILL do your part for your favourite athlete or team.

Just tap out a message of support, send it off [http://www.fan-mail.olympic.ibm.com/], sit back and let the Games begin!

Spector traces family's roots in Germany

By LEILA SPEISMAN
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Rhineland, the industrial heart of Germany, is known for its magnificent castles and heart-stopping scenery.

For hundreds of years, it was home to a fair-sized Jewish community, comprised mainly of businesspeople.

There are no Jews left there now. Helen Spector, a Toronto personnel consultant, knows that. Her family has been traced back in the area to 1725.

"They were an ordinary, hard-working, pious country family," she told The CJN in a recent interview.

"I felt curious, somehow unfulfilled," she said, explaining why she felt she had to go.

Her trip with Regina Mueller, a local woman who has written a book on the Jews of the Rhineland, was an emotional one.

"It was quiet, tranquil," she said, "but you can feel the ghosts."

They went to Duerren, to Mueddersheim, to Gladbach, towns where their families lived.

But "there was no mezuzah, no Torahs, nothing Jewish." Only the initials, J.S., carved in the stones of the courtyard of the family home in Mueddersheim by her grandfather, Jonas Schwarz.

While the people were very hospitable, she said, some claiming to have known members of her family, "you couldn't really talk to them. They had no comprehension what it means to have no grandparents, only a few aunts and uncles, practically no cousins."

She met the person who lives in her father's house. "He said he bought the house from a Jewish family in 1938. That was quite a trick, since we didn't leave until 1939."

Spector was one of the lucky ones. Her parents and her uncle's family came to Canada in 1939, helped by the Canadian Jewish Congress. Along with other Jewish refugees, some from Hungary and Czechoslovakia, they farmed in the Oshawa area.

"We were among the group that Frederick Blair [the director of the Immigration Branch] coined the phrase 'none is too many' for," she said wryly.

Others of her family fled to Holland, where they fell into Nazi hands. A very few survived.

There are still some Jewish cemeteries remaining in the Rhineland, including the graves of some of Spector's relatives. She and her cousin put yahrzeit candles and stones from Jerusalem around the gravestones.

"Our family had to leave because they were no longer considered Germans. We were two women who came back to show that we haven't forgotten that there were Jews there. We made them [the Germans] aware that we are not a part of history that will be neglected."

While Spector's son and daughter are not particularly interested in this part of their heritage right now, "they have to know about it. Some time they might want to go back, and I have all the documentation."

She is not sure that she herself will ever return to the Rhineland. "But there might be a time when I need to go there again. I might need to show that the Jewish presence is not forgotten."

Judaism provides scientist method to interpret world

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

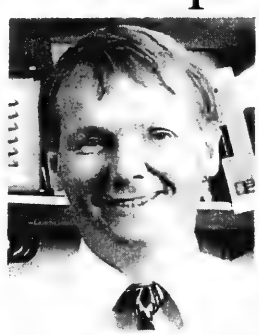
TORONTO – A Toronto-area physicist specializing in subatomic physics was recently honored by the Royal Society of Canada.

Pekka Sinervo was awarded the Rutherford Memorial Medal for his work in developing scientific measurement techniques that have led to the discovery of the top quark, a subatomic particle regarded as one of the building blocks of matter.

Since his graduation from Stanford University in California in 1986, Sinervo has been one of the principal researchers involved in the search for the top quark. Since 1990, he has headed a Canadian research group at the University of Toronto and McGill University in Montreal that has contributed to the international research effort.

Chances are, when Sinervo is not studying complex data generated from the collision of high-speed matter and antimatter particles at the $200-million Fermilab collider near Chicago, he's poring over the books of Temple Kol Ami, the Thornhill synagogue where he's been active for the past five years, currently as treasurer.

"Judaism has allowed me to find a way both to interpret how I see the world as a scientist and to integrate that with all the ethical and moral principles that I think must be at play here," says the 38-year-old Helsinki-born scientist who came to Canada at the age of two.



Pekka Sinervo

"Our world is put together in such an exquisite manner that it's hard to believe it all happened by accident. The more I understand from a scientific basis how exquisite it really is, the more I am convinced that there has to be some organizing principle behind it."

Sinervo, who headed the search for the top quark for about 2½ years, devised computer software that could detect its occurrence in the debris following collisions of subatomic particles in the Fermilab facility. Scrutinizing data generated from some 20 billion particle collisions, the search team found evidence of 12 top quarks and published a scientific paper in 1994.

Over the next 10 months, they measured another 37 top quarks and published these findings as well. The discovery has been hailed as one of the most important innovations in elementary particle physics.

The Fermilab accelerator spins subatomic particles at very high speeds, replicating conditions that are thought to have prevailed in the universe in the microseconds after the theoretical Big Bang. Sinervo, who commutes regularly to Chicago, seems not entirely sold on the Big Bang theory. "It's a model and in some ways you can't take it too seriously," he says.

Is the quark the smallest particle in the universe? "We don't know," he admits. "It's possible that there might be smaller particles. We haven't been able to rule it out."

Scientists like simplicity, he explains. "There are now 12 different building blocks of matter. Many physicists, including myself, are concerned that this is no longer a simple model. It's getting complicated."

Beth Haminyan finds new home in school gym

By GIL KEZWER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Forest Hill has a new/old synagogue.

As of August, members of Congregation Beth Haminyan will be praying in the basketball gym at West Prep Public School (Ridge Hill Drive and Old Park Road).

The congregation, whose Hebrew name means House of the Quorum, has led a nomadic existence.

Over the last 22 years, it has moved from Beth Tzedec on Bathurst Street to Beth Lida on Gilgorm Road to Cedarvale Public School on Ava Road. For the last six years, it met at J.R. Public School, also on Ava Road.

"We've never found a place with a long lease for a variety of reasons. Hopefully West Prep will be the one," says Elaine Posluns, who was recently elected to her second one-year term as president.

"While we don't have a building of our own, we do have a terrific sense of community and ruach (spirit)."

Beth Haminyan was founded as an alternative by congregants of Beth Tzedec looking for a more intimate and participatory style of worship, she recalls.

Originally praying in the Beth Tzedec chapel, the group evolved a hands-on approach to Jewish worship.

Though the 175-member congregation includes two ordained rabbis, the group has never had a pulpit rabbi. Congregants take turns leading services, reading Torah and delivering sermons.

Respectful of tradition, men and women sit apart, but there is no mechitzah. Women give sermons and read the scrolls of Esther and Ruth.

"We pride ourselves on our compromise between tradition and innovation," says Posluns.

"Children are a key part of our synagogue family, but we don't see bar/bat mitzvah as the culmination of one's Jewish education. Many of our members participate in ongoing weekly Torah and Talmud classes, held in members' homes.

"We have a full calendar of social and educational events, often related to the holiday cycle and including summer retreats. People like the minyan's intimate style. We invite you to sample our Hebrew singing, our ample kiddushim and our sense of fellowship."

In recent year's Beth Haminyan has been holding High Holy Day services in the gym of the Bialik Day School at Bathurst and Viewmount. Non-members are welcome, Posluns adds.

This Yiddish typewriter, one of the few in Canada (Underwood, circa 1923), belongs to Robert Goldenberg of Fort Erie, a retired high school teacher and zamler (book collector) for the Yiddish Book Centre. It has eight more characters than a Hebrew typewriter, but both use the same alphabet. Its carriage goes right to left, the opposite of an English-language one.

Teacher acquires Yiddish typewriter, letterpress

By BEN ROSE
CJN Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A tip from Israel led to Robert Goldenberg finally acquiring his cherished Yiddish letterpress and a scarce Yiddish typewriter in mint condition.

It was Yehuda Miklaf, a former Toronto bookbinder who made aliyah in 1986, who told Goldenberg, a retired Fort Erie high school teacher, that the wanted items might be available in Baltimore. And they were.

Up to that time, Goldenberg had run into a stone wall. At the offices of the venerable Yiddish newspaper Forward in New York, he learned that the Yiddish linotypes and letterpress had been thrown out, and the Yiddish stories are now set on a computer. All other trails led nowhere.

But Miklaf, responding to an ad by Goldenberg in a printing hobby magazine, led him to Jim Kapplin of Ethnic Press in Baltimore.

"Kapplin had type from a defunct Yiddish newspaper in Baltimore and, of all things, from a firm that had printed copies of the New Testament in Yiddish," Goldenberg said. "He split his type with me and even sold me a spare Yiddish typewriter for $50 that cost more than that to ship it to Fort Erie."

The Yiddish typewriter (Underwood, circa 1923) has eight more keys than a Hebrew typewriter though both use the same alphabet. Also, as you would expect, its carriage moves in an opposite direction to an English language typewriter.

Goldenberg, a zamler (book collector) for the Yiddish Book Centre (YBC), says he enjoys a special yichus in using one of the few Yiddish typewriters extant in Canada. He writes letters to friends on it.

With four fonts of precious letterpress from Baltimore, he hopes one day to be able to print up business cards, letterhead and invitations in Yiddish on a treadle-operated press he picked up from an 87-year-old printer going out of business in Buffalo.

Jewish arts enjoying a revival in Toronto

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Like a plant that takes years to germinate, Toronto's diverse and multi-branched Jewish arts establishment appears ready to burst into bloom.

There has been an upsurge of Jewish cultural activities around Toronto lately – a sort of ethnic renaissance that encompasses music, film, theatre, dance, literature and the visual arts. It's been remarked upon in theatre lobbies at intermission, at wine-and-cheese art receptions, between sets of klezmer music. Examples abound.

Feature

Braving into cultural territory that might have been deemed hopeless only a few years ago, cabaret divas like Beth Anne Cole, Stella Walker and Theresa Tova have been performing sets of old Yiddish songs to ecstatic audiences around town. Similarly, local ensembles like the Klezmer Conservatory Band and the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band are electrifying listeners with irresistible rhythms taken from the shtetl and infused with contemporary meaning.

The 4-year-old Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which unreels each May at the Bloor Street Cinema, has become a much-anticipated fixture of the city's arts calendar, with many screenings selling out well in advance.

Popularizing tales from such diverse sources as the Bible and Shalom Aleichem, the Jewish Story-Telling Festival marks its fifth season this October, having found an appreciative and loyal public in North York. As well, the Jewish Book Fair offers a wide range of lectures, readings and other events each November.

When novice theatre producers Helen Zukerman and Eda Zimler booked the off-Broadway revue Too Jewish? into the Leah Posluns Theatre in North York in May, they were worried that singer-monologuist Avi Hoffman might end up performing to half-empty houses. But the day after the opening, the show quickly sold out for its entire four-day run.

"We could have sold another week easily," says Zukerman. "The guy from Ticketmaster didn't know what hit him. He had never seen elderly Jews fighting over tickets like that."

Zukerman, who is director of the board of the Zukerman Charitable Foundation and artistic director of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (which the Foundation sponsors), has seen scuffles over tickets before. In mid-May, in the two-week interval between the close of the film festival and the opening of Too Jewish?, she assisted at the premiere of Yiddishland Cafe, at which some 200 patrons enjoyed a Yiddish-and-klezmer variety show in the Workmen's Circle Building in the Bathurst/Lawrence area.

"All these people came out of nowhere," she marvels. "The organizers probably could have sold the house three times over."

While many other events may be cited, some observers assert that one festival in particular – Ashkenaz, the hyperkinetic celebration of new Yiddish culture that drew some 30,000 participants to Harbourfront over six days last August – was instrumental in breathing new life into the Jewish creative arts here.

"Many Jewish artists like myself didn't realize the breadth of Jewish music until Ashkenaz raised our awareness," says Brian Katz, a Toronto musician-composer who has become increasingly involved in Jewish music. "I think it also made the general population more aware that there's a lot more to Jewish music than Fiddler On The Roof."

The flourishing of Jewish arts here is part of a global trend in which assimilated Jews are returning to their roots, observers say. As well, it is closely tied to the renewed popularity of Yiddish, the predominant language of Eastern European Jewry before the Holocaust.

"For some secular Jews, Yiddish provides a cultural identity," says Hindy Nosek-Abelson, a Toronto writer-publicist who translates Yiddish songs into highly evocative English for performers like Theresa Tova. "You can't get that with Jackie Mason or Seinfeld, or with bagels and cream cheese."

Paralleling the blossoming of the Jewish arts here is an astonishing demographic shift that has seen the Jewish population of the Greater Toronto Area double to the present 165,000 over the past two decades. Recent arrivals to this city include tens of thousands of Jewish emigres from Morocco, Russia and Israel, and at least 30,000 former Montrealers fleeing an unwelcoming social climate in Quebec.

Another aspect of the trend is education. There's been a flood of new courses offered locally in Yiddish, Hebrew, Jewish history, crafts, literature, music, dance and related disciplines. Also attracting large audiences are the frequent one-night lectures and extended courses on religious subjects – everything from Hebrew In A Day to Doing It Right On Passover Night – offered by a host of young Jewish outreach organizations.

Theories abound regarding the mysterious magnet that is drawing Toronto Jews, like their counterparts elsewhere, back to Judaism and Jewish culture.

"It's 50 years post-Holocaust and the young people today, who didn't live through the Holocaust or the founding of the State of Israel, want to know where their parents and grandparents came from," says Bayla Chaikof, chair of the committee for Yiddish studies at the University of Toronto.

"I suspect that the economy and a shift in values has something to do with it," says Nosek-Abelson. "People are shifting to things that matter. They're not allowing themselves to be fooled by the material world."

David Buchbinder, artistic director of Ashkenaz and leader of the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, which performs frequently in Europe, agrees that the local scene is heating up, but says it lags behind many cultural centres of Europe. "I wouldn't say it's flowering yet [in Toronto], but it's definitely building. Let's say the buds are out."

Many, including Buchbinder, assert that the current Jewish cultural revival is more than mere nostalgia, more than just a casual trip down memory lane to a vanished, vanquished past.

"I don't know exactly when, but sometime in the past few years, Yiddish culture has gone from being in revival to being alive again," he says. "It's gone from a situation where people were studying and curating and trying to breathe new life into something, to a situation where they're actually doing."

Some participants in the cultural mini-renaissance resist the notion that it is essentially a Jewish phenomenon and raise critical questions about the boundaries of Jewish art. Actor-director Al Waxman, famous as TV's King of Kensington and later for his role on Cagney & Lacey, has directed two plays here in the last two years – A Shayna Maidel and Sight Unseen. However, while both feature Jewish characters and deal with Jewish themes, Waxman says they should not necessarily be categorized as "Jewish" plays.

"If I were going to label these plays as anything, it would be as American," he says. "What is a Jewish play anyway? When Lee J. Cobb played Willie Loman in Death of A Salesman, everyone thought it was a play about a Jewish salesman, but that just wasn't so. And I saw The Merchant of Venice at Stratford the other day. That's about a Jew! Is that a Jewish play? No! It's just damn good theatre."

Irving Abella, former president of Canadian Jewish Congress and professor of history at York University, is acutely aware of the resurgence of local interest in things Jewish. The author of two best-selling books on Canadian-Jewish history, he taught the world's first graduate course in Canadian-Jewish history this year.

But he also notes a conflicting movement towards greater assimilation and absorption of Jews into wider Canadian society. "It's an irony," he says. "Here we are, enjoying the fruits of Jewish creativity as never before, and yet we're worrying more than ever about whether, given the current high rate of assimilation, we'll continue into the next century."

According to a Yiddish saying, however, the apple doesn't fall far from the tree. Eda Zimler, who came to Canada as a child in 1950, recalls an earlier generation's rush to assimilate.

"When I was growing up, I was like a fish out of water because Yiddish wasn't spoken anywhere except in my home," says Zimler, who is also president of Friends of Yiddish, an organization that stages cultural events featuring the once-banished language, such as the annual summer concert of Yiddish music that recently attracted some 1,500 listeners.

"I was called names as an immigrant. We all wanted to become Canadians and to be accepted as Canadians, and we shed anything that might be seen to be foreign. But now that we're all assimilated, everybody's saying, 'So what? What have we got?' Now we're suddenly finding, to our delight, that Yiddish and Yiddish culture are really in again."

Agency in Russia secure, says Gur

The situation has brightened for Jewish Agency operations in Russia. "There is every reason to believe that the future of the Jewish Agency is secure," says Dr. Baruch Gur, former Director-General of the Jewish Agency Unit in the former Soviet Union and a special emissary to UJA Federation.

Since 1990, the UJA Federation funded Jewish Agency has been helping hundreds of thousands emigrate to Israel from the former Soviet Union. However, in April, Russia's Ministry of Justice announced the cancellation of Jewish Agency accreditation. It was forced to reapply under new laws dealing with the status of foreign organizations.

"It was clear from the start," explains Gur, "that authorities could cancel accreditation anytime. We knew we were in a tenuous position because we would have to re-register under new rules."

According to Gur, conflicts between the Russian and Israeli governments about church property in Jerusalem, a shift in Russia's foreign policy and Russia's concern about high levels of emigrating Jews, contributed to the tense atmosphere.

In May, the Agency re-applied but was refused accreditation due to technicalities. Since then, the murder of Russia's Deputy Justice Minister and political rumors have made Agency officials cautious about the timing of their re-application.

Nonetheless, Gur is confident. "I'm very optimistic that the question of accreditation will be solved very soon and that the Agency will continue carrying out its important work."

UJA Federation affirms support for Jewish Agency mandate

"The mandate of the Jewish Agency remains relevant and vital," stressed UJA Federation president Sandra Brown, who with other community leaders, recently returned from the Agency's annual meeting in Jerusalem.

The Agency which receives funding from UJA Federation and other United Jewish Appeal campaigns around the world, is suffering from cash flow shortages, raising questions about its future role.

"The Agency's financial problems are all the more reason to stand steadfastly behind it," adds Brown. "No other organization can possibly duplicate its essential work, especially the rescue of Jews from dangerous regions."

The Jewish Agency brought 70,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union to Israel last year.

"Until there is another viable option of getting the work done, we, the community, must continue to support this organization," explained Donald Carr, an officer of United Israel Appeal of Canada.

Judy Gwartz, another UJA Federation delegate to the meeting, is optimistic. "Despite the financial difficulties plaguing the Agency, they're able to continue doing a lot of wonderful things," she noted.

The Agency has arranged resettlement in Israel for over 600,000 Jews from the former Soviet Union and rescue missions from both Sarajevo and Chechnya.

Israel remembers community leader

There's a permanent memorial in Israel to the late Phil Granovsky.

The Philip Granovsky Hall of Remembrance was recently dedicated at the head office of Keren Hayesod-United Israel Appeal, located in the Jewish Agency building on Jerusalem's King George Street.

Granovsky, who died in December, 1995, was a founder of United Israel Appeal of Canada, serving as its President and Chairman of its Board of Directors. Throughout his distinguished years of community service, Granovsky held key positions in several Jewish organizations including UJA Federation.

Family members in attendance at the ceremony included Granovsky's wife Shirley, son Ronald, daughter Fahla, daughter Maxine and husband Ira Gluskin along with their son Sam. Granovsky's brother Irving and wife Toddy were also present.

Toronto's Julia Koschitzky, Chair, World Board of Trustees, Keren Hayesod, called Granovsky "my mentor and my model."

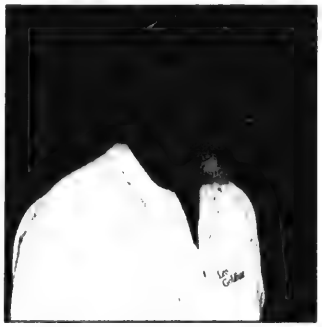
King David's Circle

Strengthening community one-on-one

A group of high profile community leaders is the driving force behind UJA Federation's latest effort to build long-term partnerships with new contributors. One of the results of this new outreach initiative is King David's Circle - a new association that encourages and recognizes leadership within the community as well as high levels of commitment to the campaign.

Toronto businessman Leo Goldhar is heading up the effort as Chairman of the King David's Circle along with Vice-Chairs Lorri Kushnir, Stephen Diamond and Gerry Ross. Other committee members include Gerry Halbert, Paul Morton, Dennis Bennie, David Goldstein, Mitch Goldhar, Brian Vyner, David Koschitzky, Stuart Berkowitz, Charles Winograd, Allen Gales and Jacques Sayegh.

In a recent interview with Community Matters Contributing Editor Adi Neuberger, Goldhar talks about the role UJA Federation plays in community building and plans for widening King David's Circle.



Leo Goldhar

Q: How does King David's Circle fit in with the general campaign?

A: People who have contributed large gifts and have demonstrated leadership and long-term commitment should be recognized in a meaningful way. They're the backbone of the campaign. It's time to show these people that their commitment is greatly appreciated and present them as examples to the entire community.

Q: How will they be recognized?

A: We plan to profile as many of them as possible throughout the campaign and highlight their achievements in various ways. We will also be planning special programs and events for them.

Q: How will the committee get new people involved?

A: The key is ongoing outreach. I see it as a natural outgrowth of the Three Year Vision to spend time telling people how UJA Federation contributes to a better quality of life. There are a lot of influential people out there who have little or no involvement with UJA Federation. We need to show them that they have an important role to play.

Q: How exactly are you reaching out?

A: We're opting for a one on one approach. We have a very dynamic group of influential, community-minded individuals who will deliver the message to their peers. We'll be relying heavily on personal contacts to make lasting connections.

Q: What is the biggest challenge to attracting new involvement?

A: Information. It's simple. Once people know exactly what UJA Federation does for the community, they'll want to get involved. People want to help. They just aren't clear about what the benefits are.

Q: Why have you given so much of your time to UJA Federation?

A: I believe in what UJA Federation does. UJA Federation impacts, in one way or another, on the lives of every Jew in the community and throughout the world. If we all work to make UJA Federation stronger, our community and our community's future will be stronger.

Community partners believe in the future

Community Partners will be a regular feature in Community Matters, profiling some of the many people who support UJA Federation. By making tzedakah a priority in their lives, they have strengthened the community.

When it comes to the Jewish community, Peter Seligman is all heart. The 39 year old independent estate and insurance planner has risen to the top of his profession and feels he owes the community something in return. What he's given back is invaluable.

"I make my living from the community," Seligman explains, "so it's only natural that I want to give something back." True to his word, he shares his good fortune and time with UJA Federation and other organizations.

Peter Seligman

"I'm committed to investing in the community," says Seligman, who, without hesitation, threw his support behind UJA Federation's Three Year Vision campaign by making a campaign pledge for 1996, '97 and '98. "The Three Year Vision strategy stabilizes our cash flow and gets people thinking long term. That's good for the future of the community."

Seligman's volunteer career includes serving on the Board of Temple Emanuel, chairing the subcommittee of Bike for Baycrest and the presidency of the Weitzman League. He helped to initiate the Outward Bound program for teens sponsored by Jewish Family & Child Service and continues to provide scholarship funding for it.

"When I finished school I felt it was time to give something of myself to the community because I felt so fortunate." And so she did by directing UJA Federation's Young Leadership Network and last year's Super Sunday telethon and by chairing the 1993 Young Leadership Mission to Poland and Israel. Rosenberg believes that by taking care of everybody, the community becomes stronger.

As a campaigner, she found the Three Year Vision allowed her to spend more time talking to non-contributors. As a donor, Rosenberg is "happy to deepen my commitment to the campaign. It will help us plan even further down the road knowing everyone's on board."

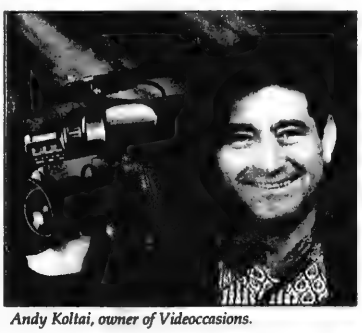
Loan Cassa lends a helping hand

The Toronto Jewish Free Loan Cassa is busier than ever these days. For more than 30 years, the organization has been helping people help themselves by providing interest free loans for business or personal purposes. Loan Cassa office manager Helen Futerman is reporting a steady increase in business loan applications.

Futerman cites a prolonged recession, numerous layoffs and tight bank lending policies as the reasons behind the rise in requests for assistance.

The Loan Cassa, with operational funding from UJA Federation and the United Way, approved 88 business loans last year worth over $460,000. All loans must be repaid in full within 26 months. Anyone may apply for a loan of up to $6000, but only those with viable business plans and credible guarantors will be approved.

A committee of volunteers, some of whom have received loans themselves, meets once a month to review and assess all loan applications. "We're the community's best kept secret," says Jerry Blitzer, who chairs the business loans committee. "When people have nowhere else to go they arrive on our doorstep and we do our best to help."



Andy Koltai, owner of Videoccasions.

Videographer Andy Koltai received a loan to start his business and says he "couldn't have done it without their help."

"We're in the business of maintaining dignity and helping people become self-sufficient," explains Futerman.

The Loan Cassa relies on donations and membership fees in addition to its capital pool.

Community Matters

UJA Federation's magnificent seven

UJA Federation has brought together an eclectic collection of university students to take a long hard look at the inner workings of Toronto's Jewish community. "In many ways," according to Susan Jackson, UJA Federation's Director of Continuity Programming, "they mirror the community itself."

One of the women, Erin Polansky, is studying to be a rabbi. Two of the seven students, Nisa English and Sheldon Frisch are Orthodox, and the others cover the spectrum of Jewish life. Noa Kaplan was born and raised in Sarnia where she lived alongside 40 other Jewish families. Saul Cohen is originally from South Africa and carried out his undergraduate studies at Guelph University. So far, what they've learned about themselves and each other is proving just as interesting and revealing as the subject of their inquiry. "Everybody's opinion counts," notes Jackson.

The students were hired by UJA Federation's Community Planning & Allocations Department to study how various Jewish organizations operate and interact with each other. The information they gather will be written into a report for UJA Federation's Action Committee for Jewish Continuity.

"One of the things we're trying to do," explains Ilana Reitzes, "is to put a face on UJA Federation and learn how other organizations perceive UJA Federation's activities."

"Everyone agrees that the community has to work together," says May Delume, who comes from a Sephardic background. "Part of our role is to identify areas of common interest among many diverse organizations."

"We couldn't have chosen a better cross section of youth to perform this very important work," says Jackson. "We're all looking forward to seeing what recommendations they come up with."

The student hirings were made possible by a grant under the Federal Government's Summer Career Placements Program. All the students will be returning to their studies in the fall.

Students speak for themselves

Sheldon Frisch, 22
York University Graduate
"I think there should be something for everyone to identify with in the Jewish community."

Nisa English, 22
York University Graduate
"It's really great that we're all able to get along with each other and work together even though we have different beliefs and come from different backgrounds."

Ilana Reitzes, 19
McGill University, 2nd year
"We've had some very interesting discussions which have taught us about respecting other peoples' beliefs and points of view."

Noa Kaplan, 23
University of Western Ontario Graduate
"I believe the key to continuity is to train motivated individuals to do outreach."

Saul Cohen, 23
University of Guelph Graduate
"When I moved from Toronto to Guelph and I was removed from the Jewish community, I became even more aware that I was Jewish."

May Delume, 20
York University
"There was never any doubt that I would be involved in the community in some way. This project has helped me discover where I would like to be connected."

Erin Polansky, 21
Rabbinical Student, Hebrew Union College
"To me Judaism is all about learning, so I believe education is the key to continuity."

הדרך לגן עדן:

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Saul Korman would be Crown Prince of Danforth if he wasn't already King

When you walk into Korry's Clothiers at 569 Danforth Avenue, the first things you notice are light and space. The lighting is bright but unobtrusive, showing fine garments at their best; well-placed mirrors enhance the spaciousness of Korry's two floors. Gleaming hardwood and swing bands from the '40's and '50's add warmth.

Korry's employs 15 people, including friendly salespeople and expert tailors in house. Growth has not tempted owner Saul Korman to abandon the personal touch: he spends plenty of time with the customers, and supervises the buying of every garment and bolt of cloth. Rare as they are, complaints are dealt with promptly, thoroughly and to the customer's total satisfaction.

Sports celebrities abound

Korry's receives many testimonials, and can take pride in a long list of prominent people who buy here. When I walked in to interview Saul, he was sitting at a table near the front door, chatting with Stormin' Norman Rumack of Fan 590 fame.

Sports celebrities among Korry's customers include Toronto Maple Leafs' Doug Gilmour, golfer Howard Ferguson and skater Elvis Stojko. Radio personalities include John Derringer, co-host of The Morning Show on Sports Radio The Fan 590 AM, Bill Carroll, host of Toronto Talks on Talk Radio 640 AM, and Joey Vendetta, host of The Afternoon Show on Q107 FM. Other customers are author George C. Scott and actor Christopher Plummer.

Saul Korman revitalizes the old adage that "the customer is king". "Good suits don't wear out fast," he confides, smiling; "for people to come back soon, they have to want to buy something new. And for that, you offer top service and variety of product." Among the quality lines sold here are Canali, Arnold Brant, Versace Classic V2, two-for-one suits under Korry's private Roberto label, and other designer labels.

Saul has given much thought to how a customer might advise a retail clothing salesman:

"Ask me when I'll wear the suit or garment I'm shopping for; then find out my preferences in colour, design and styling. Don't constantly push the merchandise: draw me out — and listen to my response to your suggestions. Ask about my present wardrobe; try to steer me to items that will add variety, yet harmonize with what I already have.

"Establish rapport with me, especially if I'm a new customer. Personal interest in me will help bring me back. Tell me about trends and fashions — and give me expert advice on how far to follow them. When I try a garment on, tell me honestly whether you think it's for me. If it is, tell me why. Does it suit my build, colouring, personality, etc.?

"If I like something expensive, but seem wary of the price, don't take that reaction too seriously. If you know it will turn me on, use all your tact to persuade me to buy. I love to get a glow of satisfaction from an important purchase.

"If I'm a long-standing customer, don't take me for granted. A casual remark that shows you remember something I said months ago makes me feel appreciated, and cements our relationship.

"Smile! An upbeat attitude is contagious.

"Write me, to thank me for my purchase and offer to make any alterations I need. In these days of E-mail and answering machines, an old-fashioned letter is a pleasant, personal touch."

Saul's motion picture career

Saul has been on the Danforth for 44 years, and at 569 for 25 years; but he's still learning. As he says in a June column in the Financial Post: "Recently, I learned that it's possible for our in-store tailors to custom-make a suit in just one day. Actor Tommy Davidson, of In Living Colour, was in town shooting his new movie Good To Go. There was a scene ready to be shot, and they lacked the necessary wardrobe.

"Vicki Graef, of Toronto's Booty Call Film Productions, brought her problem to Korry's; and we solved it. Then, Mr. Davidson liked our selection so much, he bought some Canali pieces off the rack. Thanks, Vicki, for helping me see that the impossible is possible when you put your mind to it."

Saul Korman is an accomplished promoter who does his own commercials — and an enthusiastic goodwill ambassador for the Danforth. He hails the economic and cultural achievements of the restauranteurs and other entrepreneurs there, whose work and skills have built the thriving Danforth of today.

Alongside the testimonials in Saul's office are plaques from business groups like the Ontario Men's and Boys' Apparel Association — and community and charitable organizations like the Reena Foundation. He is also a supporter of the Riverdale Jewish Community Centre.

Saul Korman is a man who enjoys his work, and believes that generosity and goodwill make good business sense. He and the staff at Korry's look forward to meeting you at 569 Danforth Avenue, just east of the Chester subway. Call (416) 463-1115.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Ouzeri: Mediterranean flavours

Toronto's personality changes with the seasons. In the summer, for example, when the cafés open their patios, we become Mediterranean. In July, Ouzeri (modelled by architect Aristidis Pasparakis on the restaurants of the Greek islands) offers you a taste of this relaxed Mediterranean lifestyle.

The front is open, the doorway wide; the natural thing is to step inside. The interior is spacious, the ceiling high, with old-fashioned fans; the walls are light, creamy green, with strokes of abstract designs in richer colors. Besides the patio, there are three levels, with marble tables imported from Greece.

Owner Fotis Sotiroulis, who is also the chef, opened Ouzeri six years ago. Manager Jimmy Nikolakakos has worked with him for five years, and most of the staff are long-term employees. "We treat them well," says Fotis; "they treat us well."

Ouzeri is a hospitable place, whose staff will sing Happy Birthday at the drop of a hat. There are plenty of new patrons, but also many regulars who know where to come back to. Good food is not to be rushed through, either in cooking or eating; so when you come, be ready to take time over a relaxed meal, good conversation and lively entertainment.

Besides several dozen Greek dishes, there are Middle Eastern flavors. Lamb shoulder fricassee, moussaka with meat, chicken and rosemary filo pie, or rabbit stiffado boureki pie will tempt the meat eater. If you like seafood, try scallops and kaseri, or prawns with feta and wine.

Of the mezes and snacks, tirosalata, a cheese dish, is recommended; so is saganaki (cheese flamed at your table). Vegetable dishes include imam bayaldi; for dessert, try bougatsa. There is a huge liquor list with about 50 wines, ten of which are Greek, all served by glass or bottle.

Tuesdays from 10 p.m. to 3 a.m., there is live bouzouki music; patrons enjoy themselves so much they dance on the tables. On Fridays and Saturdays, at about 9 or 10 p.m., the Zorba-style dancers start, in traditional Greek costume, after which Ouzeri remains open until 4 a.m.

Ouzeri seats just over 130; if you come with a large party, or on a busy night, it's best to make reservations. You will find Ouzeri at 500A Danforth, just east of the Chester subway; telephone 778-0500.

Avli tempts palate with tastes of Asia Minor

Many established North American ethnic communities have cooking styles which synthesize Old World and New. For example, there is New York-style pizza; and when you think of Greek food, probably what comes to mind is souvlaki.

Avli owners Sharon Murray and Lambrinos Vassiliou offer something quite different. This is the taste of the Old World — more particularly, Constantinople (now usually called Istanbul). Chef Lambrinos, known to patrons as Lambro, imparts the personal touch of a real chef to delectations which evoke the Middle East and Asia Minor.

Cinnamon, black currants and pine nuts flavor many dishes. The large vegetarian menu includes delicacies like lentils with Italian cheese and walnuts, grilled leek and sweet pepper, and baked eggplant and pine nuts. Meat eaters will enjoy kleftiko lamb pie, or lamb shank in sun-dried tomato and wine sauce.

Avli makes its own filo pastry, and the seafood is fresh each day. The wine list is mainly Greek; so are most of the desserts, like the crisp baklava. The main exception is the cream caramel, which Lambrinos makes according to his own high standards.

Main courses are not pre-cooked, but prepared for you individually when you order. The pies, made with special care, are cooked and served in individual clay dishes; order them or the lamb shank early. At Avli, you will rediscover the joy of a leisurely meal, free of the need to rush.

Avli opens for lunch daily at noon. The lunch menu features mezes: small, inexpensive plates, which several guests can put together in interesting combinations, as a kind of Greek dim sum. Lambrinos especially recommends the sauteed chicken livers, grilled calamari, or saganaki (fried cheese).

The liveliest nights are Friday and Saturday, with live music after 10 p.m. Chef Lambrinos, who was once a singer, often sings along with the musicians; so do other members of the staff, and the guests. If you're coming when it's busy, it's a good idea to make reservations. If you want a quieter ambience, try Sunday evening.

The walls are whitewashed, with shelves holding earthenware in classical Greek styles, and pieces of tapestry from Asia Minor. "Avli" is Greek for "courtyard"; and though the restaurant is indoors, it has a light, spacious outdoor atmosphere. Avli, at 401 Danforth Avenue, invites you; telephone 461-9577.

GREEKTOWN ON THE DANFORTH

Greektown on the Danforth: Canadian heritage in the making

More than a tourist area, Greektown on the Danforth is a community. In the summer, when the trees reach their full green and Toronto's restauranteurs put out their patio tables, this may be more obvious than in the cooler seasons. For it is in the summer, especially along the Danforth from Broadview east to Jones Avenue, that Toronto puts on its Mediterranean face.

Plenty to woo your senses

Here, when friends and acquaintances greet, you are as likely to hear "Kall' imera! Ti kanis?" as "Hi! How are you?" In fine eating establishments like Avli, Ouzeri, or Mezes, you hear patrons converse in every language of the world.

While the music of Greek polysyllables will appeal to your ears, the most important thing is not the language, but the fact that people do greet each other. Bustling and busy as the community is, everyone — not just tourists, but anyone who lives and works here — is as liable to stroll as to hurry.

There is plenty on the Danforth to woo your senses, and make you want to slow your steps: bright color and exotic decor; the sound of the bouzouki; the aroma of lamb souvlaki wafting from a grill; and the tastes of exotic foods. It is the restaurants above all — they, and the atmosphere here, at once lively and relaxed — which draw people from all over the city and beyond.

The decor of many restaurants, like Avli and Ouzeri, captures the light colors and terraced style associated with the Greek islands and mountainsides. And while souvlaki is everywhere on the Danforth, its dining establishments take pride in offering a taste of other Greek cuisines, like that of Asia Minor in Avli, or the dozens of small, tantalizing plates which gives Mezes its name.

There is plenty of live entertainment here. Ouzeri features professional Greek musicians; at Avli, the chef himself is a singer. Audience participation is the rule, rather than the exception (though after a fine, full meal, you may feel disinclined to dance on a tabletop as they do at Ouzeri). For both food and entertainment, the Danforth offers an embarrassment of riches.

A feeling found nowhere else

There are a few other Toronto streets which are wider in actual metres; but the Danforth has an expansive feel about it which you don't find anywhere else. A low-rise area of two- and three-storey buildings, the Danforth is backed on its north and south sides by neighborhoods of solid, well-kept homes, whose trees are so old and so tall they rise over the buildings. Here and there are streetside parks, where you can sit and rest your feet.

If you look closely, you see there is a solid community here. You see not only the tourists, but also the elderly and the children, as they shop, stroll or sit and chat in the cafés and parks. In the restaurants, waiters and bartenders rush to offer everyone prompt, friendly service; but there are plenty of regular guests whom they greet by name.

Nor is it just staff who do this. You will see the owners showing guests to their tables, greeting them warmly; they take seriously the idea of an owner-operated business, knowing that "keeping your hand in" is the best way to ensure ongoing quality and a happy customer.

Scattered among the restaurants, there are the small businesses that belong in any healthy city neighborhood; there are schools, houses of worship, bookstores, clubs and community centres as well. People not only work here, they live here; and it is in great part because they keep Greektown pleasant to live in, that it is pleasant to visit.

If you really want to get to know the community, there are less conspicuous aspects which you learn by chatting with the people here. For example, many restaurant owners, chefs and home cooks from all over the city who want fresh, first-class produce make early-morning trips here to buy from stores on the Danforth.

"Taste of the Danforth" August 9 – 11

If you chat a little with the staffs of different restaurants, you find that they know each other. There is plenty of competition here, but it is friendly. To thrive, a restauranteur has to cherish the firm conviction that his or her establishment is the best; but any proprietor you speak to on the Danforth can extol the virtues of that particular locale, without knocking the competition.

It is from this wealth of restaurants that the "Taste of the Danforth" festival was born. This annual event has become so popular that this year the north side of the Danforth will be closed to traffic for its duration, from Friday Aug. 9 to Sunday Aug. 11. Last year, over 40 restaurants participated with a "taste" from their menu at $1, $2 and $3. Net proceeds go to the Toronto East General Hospital Foundation, as do the proceeds from a ticket raffle for a trip for two to Greece. Other festivities include major bands (The Skydiggers perform on Saturday night), a children's area (offering activities such as bouncing things, mini golf and batting cages), and the first-ever Taste of the Danforth Fashion Show. It's a great opportunity to sample the Danforth's culinary delights while enjoying its ambience.

Saul Korman: Danforth pioneer still going strong

While the Danforth is a community, it has never been a closed enclave. Saul Korman of Korry's Clothiers, an active member of the Jewish community, is also an enthusiastic promoter of the Danforth and can be heard extolling the virtues of its many restaurants on local airwaves. Having been there over 40 years, his store was the first among the area's many fashion outlets.

Saul knows the people of this community, many of whom started as dishwashers and short-order cooks in the '50's and '60's, then opened the first modest Greek restaurants in the '70's. Many of them came here seeking both prosperity and freedom; the late Andreas Papandreou (a recent Prime Minister of Greece) lived in Canada from 1969 to 1974.

Saul shares with the people who live and work on the Danforth their joy in the prosperity and freedom of Canada. If you come to the Danforth, you are breathing, hearing and tasting Canadian heritage — not in a museum, but as contemporary history in the making. It's a compelling and pleasurable experience.

Mezes: food worth sharing

At Mezes, you feel welcome the moment you enter — because of the way street and interior merge at the patio, Mediterranean style, and because of the people that occupy this pleasant space. Owner Sue Zindros or one of her friendly staff greets you and finds you a seat within seconds.

Now situated half a block east of its original location, Mezes boasts a breathtaking new interior. It's comfortably spacious, with plenty of room between the tables, and a raised area at the rear; the terraced effect is inspired by the buildings on the mountainous islands of Greece. Bas-reliefs and paintings on the walls capture the scenes and colors of this region in blues, whites, greens, terracotta and earth tones.

Mezes' staff, says Sue, are "like family; they work with me, not for me. If you operate your own business, you have to nurture your people." This feeling diffuses itself to the patrons. While plenty of new guests come in, about 80 percent are regulars.

Mezes
AUTHENTIC GREEK CUISINE
456 DANFORTH AVENUE
(416) 778-5150

While chef Christina Kekkas offers tempting entrées, salads and combination platters, the specialties of the house are, of course, mezes. This word does not translate precisely into English. The concept evolved from the fact that in Greek culture, people enjoy sharing; everyone orders one plate, then passes one's own around and samples the others. And while one mezes makes a substantial snack, two or three mezes make a meal, and a dozen a banquet.

The dolmades (vine leaves stuffed with ground beef and rice) are succulent; the crisp kalamari with yogurt dip and a squirt of lemon will make your mouth water at the memory. Then there are many fresh, tangy dips, served with pita. Try four: taramosalata, a caviar dip; tzatziki, made from yogurt and cucumbers; hummous; and melitzanosalata, an eggplant-and-onion dip.

No need to call for reservations; come to Mezes at 456 Danforth, just east of the Chester subway. And count on a meal to remember.

Future Bakery is a family-run business.
It all started with my Polish grandfather who was a master baker in the court of the Russian Czar Nicholas. In 1952 he and my Ukranian grandmother moved to Canada and started future Bakery. They were looking forward to the "Future" in their new country!
Today my father and I run the bakery and we still use my grandparents' recipies. So the next time you eat at future, you'll see why it is more than just another bakery!

CJC's top professional taking year off

By JANICE ARNOLD
CJN Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) is losing its top professional, but only for a year.

Jack Silverstone, national executive-director and general counsel for the past 11 years, is taking a leave of absence and heads for Israel in August.

"This is something I've thought of doing for a long, long time," said Silverstone, 45. His goals are to become fluent in Hebrew and gain an in-depth understanding of Israel, which he terms "the central address of the continuity of Jewish life.

"I want to have a positive Israel experience with my family," he said. "I think that's important for any career-oriented person in the Jewish civil service. I'm grateful to the (CJC) officers for recognizing that."

He's going with his wife Ann, a social work student at McGill, and their three children: Gavriella, 14; Simon, 11; and Lee Joseph, 4. They'll be living in an apartment in Ra'ananna, north of Tel Aviv, near Herzliya.

The eldest children, already proficient in Hebrew, will be entering the regular public school system. Ann will be enrolling in an ulpan with Jack.

Silverstone, who is on leave without pay, insists he fully intends to return, probably next July, to the same position.

In his absence, CJC will be run by a small "management committee" of senior staff, he said. CJC now has six professional national-level staff in Montreal, and one each in Ottawa and Toronto, plus support staff.

Silverstone notes he will stay in touch, as needed, by phone, fax or e-mail. He also expects to do some ground work for the CJC national executive meeting in Israel Feb. 23 to March 5, next year.

The number of national staff has dwindled over the decade Silverstone has served, due to budget cuts and circumstances. Reponsibility for Holocaust remembrance and Yiddish went over to the federation; Soviet Jewry disappeared; and, most notably, executive vice-president Alan Rose, since deceased, resigned last year.

Silverstone took over many of Rose's responsibilities, which were notably international affairs, interfaith relations and claims on behalf of victims of the Nazis. One of Silverstone's last duties before leaving is attending an international claims conference in Buenos Aires.

Silverstone has been to Israel "two dozen times," but never for an extended period. Three of his longer stays, and the most rewarding, have been with Volunteers for Israel, under which he did support work at army bases. He hopes he can take another such assignment during this year off.

He also hopes to do some writing about contemporary Jewish life, and perhaps affiliate with a research institute. He looking forward to attending various conferences, such as that of the International Association of Jewish Lawyers and Jurists.

A graduate of Baron Byng High School, Silverstone was a salesman at Le Chateau clothing stores after graduating from McGill with a BA. He went back to McGill to study law, and passed both the Quebec and Ontario bars, but never practiced.

In 1978, he joined the External Affairs Department (now Foreign Affairs) and had his first foreign posting in 1982 to Mexico City. He was a vice-consul in Atlanta when then CJC president Milton Harris invited him to become national executive-director, even though he had no experience working in the Jewish community.

"I was warned it would be a meat grinder, that I'd not likely survive, but I here am now more than a decade later," said Silverstone.
